Mr. STAFFORD. The Senate bill only seeks to amend section 5549 by adding an additional paragraph.

Mr. BRAND. Yes; that is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Providing for the confinement of these older offenders. It leaves intact section 5549 as it exists to-day for the younger offenders.

Mr. BRAND. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not mistaken about it. I have read the law. The first section reads:

That section 5549 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and it hereby is, amended by adding thereto the following.

It leaves intact 5549, which provides for offenders under 16 years of age to be confined in houses of refuge. There is no amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota to change "house of refuge" to "State reformatories" in 5549.

Mr. BRAND. As I understood the gentleman, he took the position that 5549 did not leave any provision for taking care of these juvenile offenders.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman misunderstood me. Section 5549, as it exists at present, provides for the confinement of juvenile offenders under 16 years of age in houses of refuge.

Mr. BRAND. Of course, I agree with that.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no provision by the Senate amendment or the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota providing for the confinement of those juvenile offenders in houses of refuge.

Mr. BRAND. That is where they would be sent unless his amendment is agreed to.

Mr. MANN. We are absolutely agreed that we want to correct section 5550 to make it read that way.

Mr. BRAND. If the gentleman will give me a minute's time, I wish to say that as it stands now, under the Senate amendment juvenile offenders will be sent to the houses of refuge and not to State reformatories, but it was the intention of the author of this amendment to so change the law which would authorize the courts to send these juvenile offenders to State reformatories. No church, Mr. Speaker—I do not care what denomination it may be—ought to have control of convicts. They ought not to be leased or rented to any religious denomination. The State and Federal courts ought to retain control over convicts sent from those courts, and they ought to be sent to a State reformatory or some other State institution where the State would have supervision or control over them. No church ought to be made a prison for any sort of convict.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Unless the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] wishes to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I will feel constrained to object.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 10297. An act to extend the limitations of time upon the issuance of medals of honor, distinguished service crosses, and distinguished service medals to persons who served in the Army of the United States during the World War; and

H. R. 9604. An act for the acquisition of a post-office site at Madison, Wis.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2983. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under permits for the development of underground waters within the State of Nevada, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 186. Joint resolution authorizing the transfer to the jurisdiction of the Joint Committee on the Library certain reservations in the District of Columbia for use in connection with the Botanic Garden.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 160. Joint resolution authorizing the extension, for a period of not to exceed 25 years, of the time for the payment of the principal and interest of the debt incurred by Austria for the purchase of flour from the United States Grain Corporation, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referre to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2983. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under permits for the development of underground waters within the State of Nevada, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Irrigation.

GALLATIN NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 255) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Gallatin National Forest, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within the Gallatin National Forest, Mont., not to exceed 24 sections, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture the public interests will be benefited thereby and the lands are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may cause to be patented to the party conveying to the United States not to exceed an equal value of land within such national forest, or the Secretary of Agriculture may authorize the party conveying to cut and remove an equal value of timber within any national forest in the State of Montana, the value of the land or timber to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and acceptable to the owner as fair compensation: Provided, That before any such exchange is effected notice of the contemplated exchange, reciting the lands involved, shall be published once each week for four successive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county of Gallatin, Mont., and in some like newspaper published in any county in said State in which may be situated any lands or timber to be given in such exchange. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the Gallatin National Forest.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 8, by inserting, after the word "published," the words "without expense to the United States."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill is unnecessary. It is disposed of by the general exchange act. I ask unanimous consent that it may be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

OVERTIME COMPENSATION, MEAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10672) to amend the act of July 24, 1919, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920."

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire whether the Committee on Agriculture considered the proposal of limiting the hours of employment during which these workers might be employed?

Mr. HAUGEN. No. That was not considered.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is well aware of the fact that in the Postal Service we limit the number of hours that employees may be employed. Why should not these public officials be restricted in the number of hours that they may be employed?

Mr. MANN. Well, sometimes it is absolutely necessary to inspect the meat.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but it is not necessary to work 24 hours a day, or 16 hours.

Mr. MANN. It is necessary to permit them to do it if they are going to get the meat out unless you increase the number of inspectors or have a surplus of inspectors.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, I think it might be well to have a surplus of inspectors.

Mr. MANN. Well, in the Post Office Department they have substitutes, but not so in this service.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the Post Office Department they are limited to eight hours. I think there should be some limit of time fixed that these public servants should be required to work.

Mr. MANN. They are not required to work.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are virtually required to work. If they were given orders to continue at their employment they would continue to work, otherwise they would lose their positions.

Mr. MANN. Well, the Committee on Appropriations might give us a surplus, but probably they will not.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no prospect of their giving a surplus. I wanted to know if any gentleman would have any objection to limiting the hours of employment?

Mr. HAUGEN. My understanding is that their hours are limited. If they work overtime they are allowed pay for time and half time.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are not considering the pay, but I am considering this subject from the standpoint of whether any officer of the Government should compel these workers to work more than a certain number of hours a day.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is no objection on their part to working overtime, provided they get pay for time and half time. Of course, the packers are compelled to pay for part of it and the Government for the rest.

Mr. STAFFORD. My idea is that it would be better for the protection of the employees and their welfare to limit the number of hours to not more than 10, say, in any one day, so as to save them from being compelled to work 16 hours a day.

Mr. MANN. There are times when it may be desirable to have them work long hours, and the next day they may not work very much. The meat has to be inspected.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will not press my view on the bill, although I strongly believe there should be a 10-hour limitation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved July 24, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920" (41 Stat. L., p. 234, and the following), be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

I. By striking out on page 241, line 46, after the word "determine," the comma and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

II. By striking out on page 241, in said line 46, the following provision, beginning on said line 46 and ending with line 48: "and to accept from such establishments wherein such overtime work is performed reimbursement for any sums paid out by him for such overtime work."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ERADICATION OF CITRUS CANKER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10673) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to pay miscellaneous expenses incurred during the fiscal years 1916 and 1917 in connection with the eradication of citrus canker in the State of Alabama.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this seems to be a bill to pay a claim, and not a very good claim at that.

Mr. HAUGEN. I desire to say to the gentleman that evidently some one in the department misplaced confidence in people who subscribed and promised to pay certain amounts of money. The department advanced the money. It is a small amount.

Mr. MANN. Is not this a case where the Government agreed to pay a certain amount of money if the State paid a certain amount of money, and thereupon the State, having agreed to pay the money, expended it? They expected to have the money contributed to the State by private contributions, but not getting it they now ask the Government to pay it.

Mr. HAUGEN. We are paying the money that should have been paid by the people who subscribed. They did not make good. They repudiated their promises.

Mr. MANN. The money was expended by the State officials?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; with the understanding that an equal amount was to be paid by the subscribers.

Mr. MANN. Not only by an understanding, but they had secured from private individuals promises to contribute a certain amount of money if the Government would pay an equal amount. Then the State officials go ahead and spend the money. It is their business to collect it. But not being able to collect it according to their agreement, then they ask the Government to pay it. Poor Uncle Sam!

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. They are just following the usual course, are they not?

Mr. MANN. Yes. Here was a case where the people of Alabama urged the Government to contribute a certain amount of money to help eradicate citrus canker. The Government agreed to pay half, and the State of Alabama officials agreed to raise half. They said they had raised it. Then they went ahead and spent it. Then they found out they had not raised it. Then they wanted Uncle Sam to pay what they had spent. Uncle Sam paid his half.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The other half did not grow, did it?

Mr. MANN. I will say this, that I doubt whether any money was ever more profitably expended in the history of the work of the Agricultural Department than was expended in the eradication of the citrus canker. Good results came out of it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. What happened which resulted in their not being able to get this money from the people who had subscribed it?

Mr. HAUGEN. As stated in the report—

In Alabama a subscription list was prepared in the city of Mobile, the two counties of Baldwin and Mobile being the areas chiefly interested in cooperating with the Bureau of Plant Industry. Subscriptions were pledged in excess of $3,000, a part of which was advanced by the local banks. On this basis the work was laid out by the State Board of Agriculture of Alabama and inspectors employed. The Department of Agriculture authorized the State board to spend not to exceed $3,000 of Federal funds, based on the subscription fund, which it was anticipated would be paid. Many of these subscription funds were later repudiated, some on account of the disorganization of the nursery and land business, the feeling that the citrus canker would destroy the industry discouraged many, and a number of others were unable to pay. The inspectors were employed by the department. Their salaries have been paid, but a number of claims for necessary traveling expenses incurred in going from place to place under orders and on official duty have been disallowed through lack of funds. They were employed and ordered about by a representative, representing both the State and the department, who, if he had held rigidly to the letter of the law, would never have incurred liabilities on a mere promise or obligated the Government beyond the actual cash in hand, or the cash that had been allowed to him by Federal authority. The total of the claims presented so far is $688.98, which is claimed by 10 men.

As this report states, the subscriptions were not paid, and as a result the Government is pledged to pay the $688.98. As I have stated, it was expected that the subscribers would make good. They did not make good. The money was advanced and should be paid. I agree with the gentleman that in the expenditure of this money caution should have been exercised, and that they should have collected the money in advance so as to be sure that they had it and that the Government should never have been called upon for any part of the amount which had been subscribed; but the money has been advanced.

Mr. WALSH. I was asking what, if anything, happened which caused them not to honor the subscriptions that they had agreed to make?

Mr. MANN. The work was so successful that the citrus canker was done away with, and they could not see any reason why they should pay for it after it was done.

Mr. LAYTON. Their idea was to let the Government do it.

Mr. WALSH. That was a pretty good reason, where the Government was concerned. That is the usual process of reasoning in such cases.

Mr. HAUGEN. Possibly they thought that the Government could pay it more easily than they could.

Mr. MANN. We have been trying to get a rise out of somebody from Alabama, but do not seem to be able to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of the appropriation of $79,720 for "Eradication of citrus canker" made available by the Agricultural appropriations act of March 3, 1921, not to exceed $1,200, for the payment of miscellaneous expenses incurred during the fiscal years 1916 and 1917, in connection with cooperative work of the United States Department of Agriculture and the Alabama State Board of Horticulture, in the eradication of citrus canker in the State of Alabama.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

FORT FETTERMAN MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10002) to extend the provisions of section 2455, United States Revised Statutes, to the lands within the abandoned Fort Fetterman Military Reservation, in the State of Wyoming.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will reserve the objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill may be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8334) to amend the laws relating to the Postal Savings System.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. ROUSE. I object.

RURAL CARRIERS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7544) authorizing the Postmaster General to temporarily reduce the pay of rural carriers for disciplinary purposes instead of suspending them without pay.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not provide any way for a rural carrier to have the opportunity to file a reply to any complaint that might be made against him by the Post Office Department. It does not provide that an inspector shall be detailed to investigate any charge that might be made against a rural carrier. I do not believe it would be a good policy on the part of the department to reduce the pay of one rural carrier 25 per cent, another 50 per cent, another 75 per cent, and so on. In other words, this bill if enacted into law would, in my opinion, work a hardship on those splendid men who are engaged in this occupation, and I can not favor legislation which might be used by some unscrupulous person to injure carriers who might have charges filed against them for various reasons. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman will reserve his objection I will make an explanation.

The compensation of rural carriers is fixed by statute. The department has no control over it, except that where there is a failure of service or a delinquency the department may remove or suspend without pay, but can not do anything less than that. They may suspend a rural carrier and he loses his salary, but they can not deduct anything from it. This is in the interest of the rural carriers. We had a hearing on this bill, and there was no objection on the part of any representative of the rural carriers.

A letter from the Postmaster General requesting the committee to consider the advisability of this legislation and explaining its purpose follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 11, 1921.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Under existing law rural letter carriers may be disciplined only by reprimand, suspension from duty without pay, or removal.

Suspension from duty without pay often works an undue hardship on the employee, and, in the opinion of the department, it would be far preferable in many cases to reduce temporarily his rate of pay, thus sufficiently penalizing the carrier without depriving him entirely of his income. Such action can not, however, be taken at this time, as the reclassification act of June 5, 1920, fixes specifically the rates of pay for routes of various lengths.

It is, therefore, recommended that your committee consider the advisability of enacting appropriate legislation in this matter, and the following tentative draft is submitted:

"That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion, whenever for disciplinary purposes he deems it advisable to do so, to reduce temporarily the pay of rural carriers, provided that in no case shall such a reduction in pay be of more than one grade as fixed by the act of June 5, 1920, nor extend over a greater period of time than one year."

Sincerely yours,

WILL H. HAYS, Postmaster General.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I should like to know if the rural carriers' organization has made any recommendation relative to the merits of this proposed legislation?

Mr. STEENERSON. None whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then it should be considered. If they have made no representation concerning it, that is a very good reason why we should consider it.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Inasmuch as this provides a method of laying rural carriers off for the period of a year, I will object.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RURAL ROUTES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8927) authorizing establishment of rural routes of from 36 to 75 miles in length.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if I understand the law, there is a method at the present time which can be put into effect for the purpose of establishing these motor routes. It has been the policy of the Post Office Department in the past to establish a number of these long routes, known as motor routes, in States where they have no macadam roads, and when bad weather came the service was seriously injured, because the route was too long for the carrier to make in a day. Inasmuch as we have at the present time a method by law whereby rural routes of this length can be established, I do not believe it ought to be changed.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, under the present law the routes of horse-drawn vehicles are limited to 36 miles and the motor-drawn vehicles are limited to a minimum of 50 miles; so between the two there is no possibility of either one kind of route or the other. Now, there are cases where the motor routes might be lengthened, and it would afford accommodation to many deserving families in certain parts of the country if this authority was granted. Of course, the department would not avail itself of the authority if the service could not be maintained with efficiency. The department has recommended it and the committee has considered it carefully, and we think the authority to establish these routes between 50 and 36 miles ought to be granted.

Mr. McCLINTIC. If I understand the gentleman correctly, the motor routes up to 50 miles can be established?

Mr. STEENERSON. From 50 miles upward, but not less than 50 miles.

Mr. McCLINTIC. If this bill becomes a law it will have the effect of repealing the statute which makes it necessary that petitions be circulated and that the patrons of the route, or a certain number, sign it before a motor route can be authorized.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think so; there is not a word in the bill about that. The existing law is not repealed.

Mr. McCLINTIC. It has been my experience in Oklahoma that practically every motor route established has proven unsatisfactory. Many petitions have come to me from the patrons of these routes asking that they be abolished and wagon routes be established to take their place.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is news to the chairman of the committee; I never heard of it.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I dare say that 90 per cent of the motor routes where they have no macadam road have proven unsatisfactory.

Mr. STEENERSON. This would give the department authority to establish motor routes less than 50 miles. Fifty miles is the minimum now, and this would wipe out that restriction, so that really it is in the interest of the patrons which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I have heard a number of complaints about the establishment of motor routes, and I do not think that it is a wise policy to authorize the Government to destroy or repeal the laws relating to this subject. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

ADDING TO THE SISKIYOU NATIONAL FOREST, OREG.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10461) adding certain lands to the Siskiyou National Forest in Oregon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to add to the Siskiyou National Forest, in Josephine County, Oreg., somewhat over 120 acres of land that is so situated as to include about all the land suitable for the use of tourists, campers, and others who visit the Oregon caves. It is necessary for the construction of accommodations for visitors and for camp sites. An excellent road has been constructed nearly to the caves and it will be completed in the near future.

Mr. BLANTON. Does this bill restrict the acquisition to 120 acres?

Mr. HAWLEY. One hundred and twenty acres and lot 1, and I do not know exactly the area of lot 1, but a few more acres.

Mr. BLANTON. How much are we going to pay for it?

Mr. HAWLEY. It only transfers it from the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior to that of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. All public land?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is already public land, and this is to prevent it going into private hands, thus permitting some private owner to charge exorbitant prices for camping privileges to tourists.

Mr. BLANTON. Can the gentleman tell us how many extra employees this additional will entail and how much in salaries?

Mr. HAWLEY. None at all; there is no additional expense.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the northeast half of the northeast quarter and the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 31, township 39 south, range 6 west, of the Willamette meridian, are hereby added to and made a part of the Siskiyou National Forest in Oregon.

The following committee amendments were read:

1. Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "northeast," where it first occurs in said line, and insert in lieu thereof the word "north."
2. Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof a comma (,).
3. Page 1, line 4, after the word "quarter," where it occurs the second time in said line, insert the following words: "and lot one."
4. Add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to sell the merchantable timber on the land added to the Siskiyou National Forest by section 1 hereof in accordance with the regulations governing the sale of public timber in the national forests, and the entire proceeds of any sale of the timber on such land shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in a special fund designated as 'The Oregon and California land-grant fund,' referred to in section 10 of the act of Congress approved June 9, 1916 (39 Stat., 218), and be disposed of in the manner therein designated, the land added forming part of the area which revested in the United States under the provisions of the said act."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LAKE GEORGE, YAZOO COUNTY, MISS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1162) declaring Lake George, Yazoo County, Miss., to be a nonnavigable stream.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice, to retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESCALERO RESERVATION INDIANS, NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6294) promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I do not know much about this bill; I do not know what it aims to accomplish, but I do know that if it is going to promote civilization it is a good thing. I also know that if we would also introduce some bill to continue civilization and civil service in this country it would be a good thing. I note that the President by drastic order——

Mr. MANN. Oh, now, now!

Mr. LINTHICUM. The other evening removed summarily the heads of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, we have all noticed that. I do not think it is necessary to occupy the time of the House in comment upon it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to make some caustic observations upon the dismissals from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think I have ever made any caustic observations. I want to comment somewhat upon this summary removal of the men and women from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, because I think it was very unusual.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes in which to reply to the gentleman's speech.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill and to the requests of each gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts reserve his objection to the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I reserve my objection to the bill, but not to the requests of the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Speaker, if there is any information that I can furnish the gentleman with reference to the bill, I shall be very glad to do so. I do not think there could well be any objection made to the bill itself. The assistance proposed to be rendered to the Indians on the Mescalero Indian Reservation under the provisions of this bill is to be paid for out of the sale of timber from their reservation, which has already been contracted by the Indian agent. This Mescalero Indian Reservation has timber on it of the approximate value of two and one-half million dollars, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs informs our committee that contracts have already been let for the sale of $450,000 worth of this timber. It is proposed to repay such loans as may be advanced to this reservation under provisions of this bill out of the sale of this timber off the reservation. If there is any further information that I can give the gentleman, I would be very glad to do so. I do not see how there can be any objection made to the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROACH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This is practically a loan by the Government to the Indians?

Mr. ROACH. It amounts to that; yes; but in that connection the Commissioner of Indian Affairs informed our committee that a sale has already been perfected of $450,000 worth of timber upon which certain payments would shortly be coming due. These payments extend over a period of 10 years, but some of the payments will be due in the near future, and payments on these timber contracts will be made from time to time, as they become due.

Mr. MANN. This loan is to be made without interest?

Mr. ROACH. Under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. The Indians have assets, and the suggestion is that we loan them money against those assets without interest.

Mr. ROACH. As far as I recall, the matter of interest I do not believe was mentioned or discussed.

Mr. MANN. It is practically a loan.

Mr. ROACH. Yes; that is what it amounts to.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think, if we start to loan money to people who need it—and the Indians, I admit, are in a peculiar situation, of course—it would be perfectly fair and a little better precedent if we should require that some interest on the loan be paid?

Mr. ROACH. I am not prepared to state that the Secretary of the Interior intends to finance this bill wholly out of the payments made on this timber, but that is the impression that I gained of the matter—that such amounts of these payments as were made from the sale of the timber were to be so utilized, and the bill gives the Secretary of the Interior or the Indian agency authority to utilize those payments in the promotion of the general welfare of that tribe of Indians by building homes, by improving their property, buying them live stock, and supplying them with necessary farming implements, and so forth, to enable them to make some progress in the matter of civilization.

Mr. MANN. Of course, as far as supplying them homes is concerned, that is mostly bunk. They would not live in homes if you built them palaces, but as far as furnishing them facilities for cultivating the soil or for grazing or anything of that sort, it is highly desirable. They have a large forest, and the contract has been let to cut part of that forest within the next 10 years, to the total amount of $450,000. The forest is increasing in value, I apprehend. The proposition now is that we shall advance them $250,000 against that. No one knows just when the advances will be made or when they will be repaid.

Mr. ROACH. It is known to this extent, that the total amount of $450,000 already contracted is to be paid within a period of 10 years from date.

Mr. MANN. Yes. I apprehend that $250,000 might be paid back much before the expiration of the 10 years. We do assume that it would be all paid back in 10 years, although experience teaches us that the history of such things is that they are rarely ever paid back. They always have some new use for the money.

But it would not be fair to give consideration to the question as to whether, if we are not to loan this money, they should pay some interest on it. If we get any money of the Indians in the Treasury, we pay interest on it.

Mr. ROACH. Had I not been under the impression that these advances would really be taken care of out of the payments from the sale of this timber, I would have raised before the committee the question of interest, but it did not occur to me for the reason, as stated, that I was under the impression that the money was really to be paid out from the money derived from the sale of timber.

Mr. MANN. If it was only to be paid out of money that comes in from the sale of timber, certainly I should not think there would be any opposition.

Mr. ROACH. I am not prepared to state that such is true, but I have that impression. I do not want to be understood as stating such to be the fact, however. At any rate, the loans so made are to be paid from these timber sales.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be wise to find it out? If we sell the timber for these Indians, I can see no reason, as the money comes in, why it should not be turned over for the use of the Indians, and that is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. ROACH. Under the circumstances, if the gentleman feels obliged to object——

Mr. MANN. I do not know that I shall object, but the gentleman in charge of the bill, I should think, would want to give the House full information, and it would not hurt to let it go over for a couple of weeks until he finds out about these particular matters inquired about.

Mr. ROACH. I ask unanimous consent that under the circumstances the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEASES FOR POST-OFFICE PREMISES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10244) repealing the law relating to the termination of leases for post-office premises.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state what has arisen to make such legislation necessary?

Mr. STEENERSON. There is a statute which makes it mandatory in all leases of post-office premises to include a clause that the lease shall terminate in the event a public building be built there, and without this statute the department could, of course, cancel such lease at any time they thought proper; and it developed, in the city of New York especially, as this clause was mandatory to be included in the lease, that it increased the rent, and the joint commission had it up. And as I recall, one building to be built—the Pennsylvania station—it would make a difference in the rental of $175,000 for the period of the lease.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I believe it has been the policy of the Post Office Department for many years, in making a lease, to put in a cancellation clause providing the Government could cancel the lease at any time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Has that policy been changed?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; in some cases.

Mr. MANN. Because this provision does not make any difference whether it is in or out of the lease if the cancellation provision is in. Now, some time ago, maybe a year or so ago, I called at the department about the lease of a substation in Chicago, a place where they wanted to make a lease. The owner of the property absolutely refused to make a lease to the Government with the cancellation clause in it. He said he could lease his property for the same length of time to private parties without a cancellation clause, and he was not going to lease it to the Government, rentals being now high in Chicago, and in two or three years they would drop down and the Government might cancel the lease and leave the property on his hands. He said, "Get somebody else's property, but you can not get mine." And the department absolutely refused to consider any proposition that did not contain the right of cancellation in it. Of course, if the cancellation clause is still continued in leases it does not make any difference whether this provision about cancellation in erecting a Government building is in or not, because they can cancel with or without an excuse. Now, is that changed?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am so informed that where it is thought it would affect the rental to be paid they take it out, but this other clause is mandatory to be included.

The situation in New York is a special illustration of the disadvantage. It was said before the commission and before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads that by reason of this mandatory clause they were prevented from leasing desirable places.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how it could make any difference in the city of New York, because they do not build any substations there at all. The Government does not own any Government buildings in which there are substations, and in any event it certainly can not apply in the city of Chicago and can not apply in the city of New York, and it can not apply in any other place where they have substations.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. There is only one substation owned by the Government in the United States, and that is in my district. It was built by the Government.

Mr. STEENERSON. The post office in the Pennsylvania Terminal was built by the United States. Outside of that the stations in New York are all built by private contractors, but the rental is agreed upon in advance. We are now negotiating with the Pennsylvania Railroad, or one of their subsidiary building companies, for an additional building for post-office purposes, and they stated before the joint commission——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

SPECIAL CANCELING STAMPS OR POSTMARKING DIES.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10941) authorizing the Postmaster General to grant permission to use special canceling stamps or postmarking dies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10941) authorizing the Postmaster General to grant permission to use special canceling stamps or postmarking dies.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant permission for the use in first and second class post offices of special canceling stamps or postmarking dies for advertising purposes in the following cases only: First, where the event to be advertised is for some national purpose for which Congress has made an appropriation; second, where the event to be advertised is of general public interest and importance and is to endure for a definite period of time and is not to be conducted for private gain or profit: Provided, That such permit shall not be for a longer period than six months and the duration of the event to be advertised: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the expenditure of any postal funds or appropriation either for the purchase of special canceling stamps or postmarking dies or for adapting canceling machines for the use of such stamps or dies or for installing the same, but all expense shall be prepaid by the permittee.

SEC. 2. That any permission granted under this act is hereby revoked in the event the Government shall find it expedient or necessary to use special canceling stamps or postmarking dies for its own purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. On page 1, line 10, strike out the following words: "Of general public interest and importance."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, line 10, strike out the words: "Of general public interest and importance."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it is, I take it, of general public interest and importance to the people of the United States that to-day, when there are already 5,000,000 American citizens out of work, walking the streets idle, that through the autocratic call of certain leaders 600,000 more able-bodied men are called from their work into a state of idleness. It is a loss not only to the people of the United States, it is a loss to those 600,000 men and their families. I want to cite to them the situation that exists in——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing the bill under consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I submit I am speaking upon the subject of "general public interest and importance to the people."

The SPEAKER. That, of course, does not make his amendment in order. The gentleman will discuss the subject of his amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the rules and practice of the House, is it not in order to speak on any subject that is germane to and embraced in the specific language that is under discussion?

The SPEAKER. Oh, the gentleman should not seriously argue that.

Mr. BLANTON. I only follow the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts before he became Speaker, when he used to speak in that fashion.

The SPEAKER. That may be, but objection being made, of course it is not in order to discuss this subject. Because the words "public interest and importance" are in the bill, it does not make everything of public interest in order.

Mr. BLANTON. May I call the Speaker's attention to the fact that once when the present Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] happened to be on the floor, he moved to strike out the last word, which happened to be the word "dollar," and he was permitted to speak at great length on the subject of the American dollar even over objection.

Mr. MANN. Under the theory of the gentleman, if he moved to strike out the word "Congress," he could talk on everything that Congress has jurisdiction over.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course, if the gentleman from Illinois does not want me to discuss this important question that is of vital interest to the people just now——

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman discuss it in a proper way and at the proper time, and not through a subterfuge.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on this important subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of bills here that I know the gentleman is anxious——

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will expedite them probably by giving me a little show here. I am going to help the gentleman expedite the bills.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman want five minutes?

Mr. BLANTON. Just five minutes. That is all I want.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, to these 600,000 miners who have been called from their work, and are now in idleness, and whose families are going to suffer, I want to cite the situation that exists in the United States in every American open-shop plant. Take, for instance, the steel industry. Under the American open-shop plan that industry to-day is giving employment to 264,000 Americans, and is paying to them an average wage of over $1,900 each. And there has not been a day during the last 12 months that they have not had work in continuous employment. Their families are satisfied. Last year they bought 255,000 shares of stock in the concern for which they work. Take the open-shop plant of Henry Ford to-day. He is employing under the American open-shop plan 63,500 Americans, and he is paying them a minimum of $6 apiece. And he has established the 40-hour week for them. He gives them also representation in all of their problems of employment.

Take the packers, if you please. They are employing to-day under the American open-shop plan 22,500 American citizens, and they are paying them a wage of at least $4.80 apiece as a minimum, and then on up according to the earning capacity of the various employees. It is all under the American open-shop plan. And if you will find me a factory that has been running continuously in the United States for the last 12 months you will find it is an open-shop factory, not an open-shop factory that denies to its employees the right to be heard or the right of representation, but open-shop factories that give to their employees the right to be heard through representatives whom they may select.

I submit to these miners that if they will look into the coal fields where the open shop is maintained, if they will look into the coal mines of Kentucky and West Virginia and such places, where the American open-shop plan has been in force for the last 24 months, they will find that the miners there are satisfied. They are receiving wages amply sufficient to maintain their families, and they are perfectly satisfied. There has not been a month during the last 12 months when they have not had work. And they have the expectation of having continuous work for the next 12 months. And I submit to these 600,000 miners who have quit work at this time, when there are 5,000,000 able-bodied men already idle and seeking work, that they are placing a hardship upon the 5,000,000 men and their families, and not only that, but they will close up lots of plants and factories in the United States, and they will take from other men and their families the right to work. Already the railroads are laying off their employees because they can not get coal. That is the direct result for which these 600,000 striking miners and their leaders are responsible.

I want to say to them that it behooves them to stop and think whether their leaders are working for their best interests. If they conclude that their leaders are not, I say to them it is their duty to their country in these days of reconstruction following the war—it is their duty to their country and their flag—as loyal citizens to go back to work and produce, not the least that they can, but produce the very maximum. That is what I have been taught all my life. It is the duty of every American citizen to produce the maximum of which he is capable. I expect if they did it there would be no more unrest and dissatisfaction in this land. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, the demand for special authorization from Congress for the use of special canceling stamps in the different post offices in the country has become so great that in order to save the time of Congress in considering them it was deemed best to have a general law on the subject giving the Postmaster General authority to govern these permits under certain limitations, namely:

Provided, That such permit shall not be for a longer period than six months, and the duration of the event to be advertised: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the expenditure of any postal funds or appropriation either for the purchase of special canceling stamps or postmarking dies or for adapting canceling machines for the use of such stamps or dies or for installing the same, but all expense shall be prepaid by the permittee.

First. Where the event to be advertised is for some national purpose for which Congress has made an appropriation; second, where the event to be advertised is of general public interest and importance and is to endure for a definite period of time and is not to be conducted for private gain or profit.

The bill was unanimously reported by the committee and approved by the Postmaster General.

The following from the report on H. R. 2185 passed last year throws some light on the matter:

APRIL 16, 1921.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. STEENERSON: In reply to your letter of the 15th instant, with which you submit a copy of bill H. R. 2185, providing for a "Pageant of Progress Exposition" canceling stamp to be used by the Chicago post office and asking for a report and recommendation on said bill, I beg to state that on account of the multiplicity of requests from numerous sources for the use of special dies advertising various projects, the department found it necessary to take some decided action and an order was signed by a former Postmaster General August 18, 1901, of which the following is a copy:

"It is hereby ordered that postmarking dies shall not be used for advertising purposes except upon special permission from the Post Office Department, application for which should be made to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and which will not be granted unless it be for some national purpose for which Congress shall have made an appropriation."

Subsequently some exceptions were made and special dies carrying recruiting data for the Army and Navy, also special dies carrying legends in the interest of the conservation of national forests, were furnished and which were paid for out of the appropriations under the control of the several departments referred to.

The requests received from various organizations, both governmental and private, for authority to use canceling machine dies for advertising various enterprises have become so numerous that it is apparent that the public regards the use of inscriptions on these dies as a good advertising medium which has led to the conclusion that there is no good reason why they should not be used to familiarize the public with various service features which might from time to time be determined as the most important concerning the operation of the Postal Service.

Based upon the foregoing conclusion, the department has recently expended $3,802.10 in the purchase of 200 dies bearing the slogan "Address your mail to street and number," which have been furnished to certain of the larger offices, including Chicago.

In view of the recent decision of the department in reference to this matter and the fact that it is uniformly denying all requests for special dies, I am of the opinion that it would be unwise to make any exception through congressional legislation and therefore have to submit an adverse report upon the proposed bill.

However, should the Congress decide that the conditions in this case are of such merit as to warrant favorable action in the matter, I would suggest that the bill be amended so as to read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit the use in the Chicago post office of special canceling stamps bearing the following words and figures: "Pageant of Progress Exposition, Chicago, July 30 to August 14, 1921."

The purpose of this recommendation is to relieve the department from furnishing the dies and placing the expense therefor upon the exposition, as has been the invariable course followed heretofore.

Sincerely, yours,

WILL H. HAYS, Postmaster General.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10740) providing for a "Don't Miss 300th Anniversary Celebration, Gloucester, Mass., August, 1923," cancellation stamp to be used by the Gloucester, Mass., post office.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether, in view of the passage of the bill we have just passed, he thinks it advisable and necessary to pass this bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do, because this bill that we have just passed through the House goes to the Senate, and it might take time before it is reached. I will say that we have included five or six other canceling bills in this same bill, and some of those events advertised are near at hand.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman from Illinois will read the additional bills included in this one, he will find that the dates of some of these events are very close at hand; some 60 days; two or three of them from Chicago.

Mr. MANN. Three of them are from Chicago. I am not familiar with them, but I think the date of "Chicago Boys' Week" has been changed. Maybe I am mistaken about that. But one of the dates of the numerous enterprises of this sort in Chicago was changed a few days ago, according to the Chicago newspapers.

Mr. STEENERSON. They have not advised the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MANN. They probably do not consider it important to give the information.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. In these events they include the Pageant of Progress Exposition at Chicago. If I recall correctly, we passed a special bill in the last Congress, or at the last session, for that. Did they not make sufficient progress at the last exposition?

Mr. MANN. Well, Chicago made more progress at the last exposition than Massachusetts has made in the last 10 years. [Laughter.] But as to continuing to make progress, we have not reached that state of self-sufficiency yet where we think we can not progress further.

Mr. WALSH. Of course it is necessary to have these special canceling dies to advertise Chicago; otherwise until we get this Great Lakes and St. Lawrence waterways project completed we may forget that there is such a place as Chicago.

Mr. MANN. Well, we are not afraid that anybody will forget that Chicago is on the map, but we like to do the best we can.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems to me that inasmuch as not only Illinois but Massachusetts is being taken care of by this very important measure both gentlemen ought to be satisfied with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am not seeking local recognition, but I want to be advised whether the same criticism or objection should not have been leveled at the act just passed as could be leveled at the language in the second section of this bill, "That any permission granted under this act is hereby revoked in the event the Government shall find it expedient or necessary to use special canceling stamps or postmarking dies for its own purposes." Would it not be better in the potential mood?

Mr. MANN. In one case we leave it to the Postmaster General or the executive authorities to revoke it. This is an act of Congress that does revoke it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, it is to be exercised by the department officials. That language, "That any permission granted under this act is hereby revoked in the event the Government shall find it expedient," and so forth, is contingent upon the exercise by some department official virtually of the discretion.

Mr. MANN. I understand. The act is the act of Congress revoking the permission. I do not know whether it makes any difference if it gives the authority to the Postmaster General to revoke it. In one case it would be a direction to the Postmaster General to revoke it and in the other a legislative act of revocation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought it was granting to the Post Office Department discretionary power to exercise it if in their judgment there was a conflict, as expressed in section 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit the use in the Gloucester, Mass., post office of special canceling stamps bearing the words and figures "Don't Miss 300th Anniversary Celebration, Gloucester, Mass., August, 1923."

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Strike out, on page 1 all of lines 3 to 7, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the use of special canceling stamps, as follows: In the Gloucester, Mass., post office, dies bearing the words and figures 'Don't Miss 300th Anniversary Celebration, Gloucester, Mass., August, 1923.' In the Chicago, Ill., post office, dies bearing the words and figures 'Chicago Boys' Week, May 19–25, 1922.' In the Sunbury, Pa., post office, dies bearing the words and figures 'Old Home Week, 150 Birthday, July 1–2–3–4, 1922.' In the Indianapolis, Ind., post office, dies bearing the words and figures 'Indiana Health Exposition, May 19–27, 1922, Indianapolis, Ind.' In the Chicago, Ill., post office, dies bearing the words and figures 'International Live Stock Exposition, Chicago, December 2d to 9th, 1922.' In the Chicago, Ill., post office, dies bearing the words and figures 'Pageant of Progress Exposition, Chicago, July 29 to August 14, 1922': Provided, That no permit shall be granted for a longer period than six months and the duration of the event to be advertised: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the expenditure of any postal funds or appropriation either for the purchase of special canceling stamps or post-marking dies or for adapting canceling machines for the use of such stamps or dies or for installing the same, but all expense shall be prepaid by the permittee.

"SEC. 2. That any permission granted under this act is hereby revoked in the event the Government shall find it expedient or necessary to use special canceling stamps or post-marking dies for its own purposes."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill authorizing the use of special canceling stamps in certain post offices."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CERTAIN LANDS IN LASSEN COUNTY, CALIF.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10554) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to Lassen County of California for certain lands, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that the bill is introduced and has been reported by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]. The reports that he makes on bills are usually more informing than the bills themselves, but this is an exception—the bill seems to be more informing than the report. Yet the bill itself is not sufficiently informing. So I wish to inquire what are the county uses and purposes for which it is proposed to have this public land used?

Mr. RAKER. Anything that the county may wish to use it for.

Mr. STAFFORD. A scavenger station or a garbage disposal plant?

Mr. RAKER. It is ordinary land for which people pay $1.25 an acre. The county wishes to buy it for county purposes. That is expressed in the resolution of the board of supervisors and the letter of the district attorney. The object is to allow the county to buy it to use for any purpose that they may want to use it for.

Mr. STAFFORD. Have the board of supervisors any well-defined plan of the purposes for which they wish to use this land?

Mr. RAKER. They have not divulged that to me. It is for general county purposes. They wish to pay $1.25 an acre for it, just what anybody else would pay, and they can use it for any county purposes for the benefit of the people of the county.

Mr. STAFFORD. They might use it for a graveyard.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Or for burying old horses.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; they could put an incinerating plant there, or anything they want to, for county purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. If they should use it for those purposes it would not impair the value of any surrounding public land?

Mr. RAKER. In no degree whatever.

Mr. MANN. Is there any timber on this land?

Mr. RAKER. None whatever. It is nontimbered land.

Mr. MANN. What character of land is it?

Mr. RAKER. Sagebrush land.

Mr. MANN. Is it used for the county poorhouse?.

Mr. RAKER. No, indeed.

Mr. MANN. Is it to be used for the county poorhouse?

Mr. RAKER. They are going to use it for general purposes. Part of it now is being maintained by the county, wherein there have been some burials by the county for 40 years.

Mr. MANN. Some what?

Mr. RAKER. A burial ground. On one corner of it is a schoolhouse owned by the county. The county wants it for all county purposes. It is away out in the outer district of the county, and the people want it, and the county is willing to pay for it. They want to fence off the graveyard at one end, and fence it off for a dumping ground at the other end.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt about the county being willing to pay for it. There seems to be some uncertainty about the use that is to be made of it.

Mr. RAKER. The county will pay the same price for it that is paid for all Government land of this kind, $1.25 an acre.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I should like to ask the gentleman from California why he omitted in line 10 the words "uses and"? Those words appear in line 8—

Shall use said tract of land for county uses and purposes only.

Then it says—

Provided, That whenever said lands cease to be used by said county for county purposes——

Mr. RAKER. This is the same language that we have used in several other bills.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But why did you omit the words "uses and"?

Mr. RAKER. They were not thought necessary.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then why did you use them in the first place?

Mr. RAKER. We thought it would amplify it, and in the other case would make no distinction.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will not object if the gentleman will consent to insert in line 10, after the word "county" the words "uses and."

Mr. RAKER. I think that is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to issue patent to Lassen County (one of the duly organized and existing political divisions of the State of California, a body corporate and politic, with full power to hold and own real estate), of, California, for the following tract of public land, to wit: The northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 4, township 37 north, range 11 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, Susanville land district, in the State of California, upon payment therefor to the Secretary of the Interior for the Government of the United States the full sum of $1.25 per acre, which patent shall be issued upon the express condition that Lassen County shall use said tract of land for county uses and purposes only: Provided, That whenever said lands cease to be used by said county for county purposes or are attempted to be sold or conveyed, then, in that event, title to said lands and the whole thereof shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That such patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of all gas, oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in such land, and the right to the use of the land for extracting the same.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized" strike out the word "an" and insert the word "and."

Page 1, strike out all of lines 5, 6, and 7, down to and including the words "of" in line 7.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend on page 2, line 10, after the word "county" by inserting the words "uses and."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will not the gentleman consent also to insert the word "only," so that it will read as it reads in the previous part of the paragraph? They might use it for county purposes, and at the same time use it for some other purpose.

Mr. RAKER. We want it for county purposes and nothing else.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then put in the word "only" after the word "purposes."

Mr. RAKER. I move to insert after the word "purposes," in the same line, the word "only."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 2, line 10, after the word "county," insert the words "uses and," and after the word "purposes" insert the word "only"—

So that as amended the line will read—

be used by said county for county uses and purposes only.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TO AUTHORIZE THE SECRETARY OF WAR TO SELL PITTSBURGH STORAGE SUPPLY DEPOT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10925 to authorize the Secretary of War to sell real property known as the Pittsburgh Storage Supply Depot, at Pittsburgh, Pa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire if the land described in lines 10 and 11 and following are a part of the Pittsburgh Storage and Supply Depot at the present time?

Mr. HULL. It is.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report does not disclose the fact that this acre of land is a part of the larger tract described in the fore part of the bill.

Mr. HULL. As I understand, it is a part of the supply depot.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I can assure the gentleman that it is a part of the property.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, what is the reason for selling any property like that at private sale?

Mr. HULL. Private and public sale.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the idea of selling it at private sale at all?

Mr. HULL. They want to sell it and get the most money they can out of it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I shall object unless the word "private" is stricken out.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Let me state to the gentleman one reason for this—and I am sorry that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] is not here to go into it more fully. The purpose of selling this land is to enable Pittsburgh and the county of Allegheny to secure a tract for an approach to a new bridge ordered by the Secretary of War. It is proposed to sell it at private or public sale, so that a part can be transferred to the city of Pittsburgh and the county of Allegheny.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why is it necessary to put in the word "public" if it is to carry out an arrangement that is already made?

Mr. MANN. The first bill introduced provided only for a private sale, it being understood that it would be sold to the county of Allegheny. The Secretary of War asked that there be inserted in the bill a provision authorizing a public sale in order that it could not be held up.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. The letter from the Secretary of War confirms what the gentleman from Illinois has just stated. The letter says:

You are advised that according to the terms of this bill the property must be sold at private sale, and the city of Pittsburgh and county of Allegheny are the only possible purchasers of this property.

The report is to the effect that the other bill limiting it to private sale was objectionable to the Secretary of War, and he wanted to have it provide for a public sale so as to protect the department in not being held up.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who was the proposed purchaser——

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The city of Pittsburgh and the county of Allegheny that wanted it for an approach to a bridge. I would like to say that this little bill is a matter of considerable importance at the present time to the city of Pittsburgh. The Secretary of War in 1917 ordered the county to raise certain bridges on the Allegheny River, which involved a tremendous expense. During the war it was impossible to get the materials, and since that time little has been done for the reason that the cost was tremendous, and the bonding power of the county has been practically exhausted. I have been trying to get the Secretary of War to approve of other improvements on the Monongahela and the Allegheny, and have met the statement that no improvements will be made until these bridges are raised. I have put through two bills for improvements on the Monongahela—one at Glassport—and the Secretary of War has refused approval on the ground that these bridges are not yet raised on the Allegheny. Now, the city and county are anxious to meet this situation, and this approach to one bridge is a vital factor.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This bill would permit him to sell it to any corporation or any private individual at private sale. It does not limit the sale to either the city or the county. This is a bill which would authorize the sale of about 19¼ acres of land in the city of Pittsburgh to anybody at private sale. There is not anything in the bill, on the face of it, which shows any such intention as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has described.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is the intention.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why does the bill so carefully omit anything that would indicate what the real intention is?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] introduced the bill after consultation with the Secretary of War.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is immaterial at whose suggestion it was introduced. What does the bill propose to do? It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to sell 19 or more acres of land in the city of Pittsburgh to any person at private sale. The bill does not in even the remotest degree indicate that it is contemplated to sell the land to the city of Pittsburgh or the county of Allegheny.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois has explained the matter, that the first bill was for private sale alone.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To whom?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. To the city of Pittsburgh and the county of Allegheny, but the War Department objected to this provision.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HULL. If we should have the bill read as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] wants it to read, we would simply tie it up. The Secretary of War wants to get as much money out of this property as possible, and he wants it broadened out. It was at his suggestion that it was made to read at public sale.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, that does not meet the objection at all. The bill proposes to sell approximately 20 acres of land in the city of Pittsburgh to anybody at private sale.

Mr. HULL. Private or public?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Private sale, I am talking about. The bill does not say to the city of Pittsburgh or to the county of Allegheny. It does not say to anybody. It leaves it to the unlimited discretion of the Secretary of War to sell it at private sale to any purchaser.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. If it is the intention of the Secretary of War to get as much out of this property as possible, does not the gentleman think he would be likely to get more money if we restrict him to selling it at public sale where everybody would have a chance to bid, and not at private sale where only in some instances one particular person has a chance to bid?

Mr. HULL. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that if you pass this bill you will get the most money out of that property that can be received. If you confine it to public bids, it may be that the city of Pittsburgh and the county of Allegheny can not negotiate as they would wish to for a part of it. I know that is what they wanted put in the bill themselves, and they ought to know what they want.

Mr. BLANTON. A city or a county has the same right to buy property at public sale that it has to buy property at private sale.

Mr. HULL. They may want to negotiate, as I say.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. With whom?

Mr. HULL. Between themselves, the county and the city. As I understand it, they contemplate a joint proposition to get a piece of this land.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Negotiations are to be made with the Secretary of War?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose this bill, in express terms, authorized him to sell to the county of Allegheny or to the city of Pittsburgh, at private or public sale, certain lands; that would on the face of the bill show what was contemplated, but here is a bill which, in express terms, proposes to authorize the sale of approximately 20 acres of land in the city of Pittsburgh at private sale to anybody.

Mr. HULL. If you are going to get the most money out of it that it is possible to get, and if somebody else wants to pay more than the county of Allegheny or the city of Pittsburgh, I do not know that we would have any objection to it. We are going to have a great many of these propositions, and we want to get just as much money out of them as we can.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That same argument could always be made whenever it might be proposed to sell any public lands. The gentleman might say that the Government could get more money if it could have an opportunity to sell any of its land at private sale. The gentleman could make that argument every time the Government wished to sell. But there could not be a worse practice than to authorize any man to sell not his own land but land belonging to the United States Government to anybody for any price in his discretion and at private sale. I object to the bill in its present form.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOWELL). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS OF RAPID CITY INDIAN SCHOOL, SOUTH DAKOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10478) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my only criticism of the bill is as to where the proceeds of the sale shall go. The bill provides that the money derived from the sale of these small tracts of land shall be available for expenditure for improvements at this school. The Committee on Appropriations is making the determination as to the amount of money that shall be available for all school purposes. I think it is the general practice to have such funds turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and I would inquire whether the gentleman from South Dakota has any objection to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. No; I should have no objection to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to sell and convey, under rules and regulation to be prescribed by him, two parcels of land included within the Rapid City Indian School Reserve, S. Dak., the first containing fifty-five one-hundredths of an acre, being a portion of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, section 4, township 1 north, range 7 east, Black Hills meridian, south and east of the Pennington County Highway; the second, containing 3.59 acres, being a portion of the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, section 8, township 1 north, range 7 east, Black Hills meridian, south and east of the Rapid City, Black Hills & Western Railroad right of way: Provided, That the proceeds derived from the sale of this land shall be available for expenditure for improvements at said Rapid City Indian School.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "and directed."

Line 4, after the word "convey," insert "at not less than their appraised value."

Line 7, strike out the word "Reserve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "grounds."

Lines 8 and 9, before the word "fifty-five," insert the word "approximately"; strike out the words "being a portion" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in the southeast corner."

Line 11, after the word "meridian," insert the word "lying."

Line 3, strike out the words "being a portion" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in the southeast corner."

Line 5, after the word "meridian," insert the word "lying."

Line 7, after the word "the" insert the word "net."

Line 8, after the word "of," strike out the words "this land" and insert the words "these tracts."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to taking the vote of the various committee amendments in gross? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the word "regulation" in line 5, page 1, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "regulations" in the plural.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "regulation" and insert in lieu thereof the word "regulations."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 2, line 8, by striking out after the word "be" the words "available for expenditure for improvements at said Rapid City Indian School" and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: On page 2, line 8, after the word "be," strike out the remainder of the proviso and insert in lieu thereof the words "covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

On No. 21: Appropriates $2,468,451 for the General Accounting Office in the detailed manner proposed by the House, instead of $2,496,101 in a lump sum, as proposed by the Senate. The detailed salaries proposed in the House bill have been reduced in amounts of individual salaries and in number of salaries in the aggregate of $400,000, of which $375,000 is made available for temporary clerks, stenographers, typists, etc., with a salary limitation of $1,800, and $25,000 is added to the appropriation of $150,261 proposed in the House bill for contingent and miscellaneous expenses. The aggregate proposed in the substitute for the House provision is $150 less than the amount carried and is $27,650 less than the amount proposed by the Senate under the lump sum.

On No. 35, relating to salary limitations on Shipping Board and Fleet Corporation funds: Inserts a substitute for the House and Senate provisions which allows 6 employees between $11,000 and $25,000 each per annum and 4 between $25,000 and $35,000 each per annum, instead of 13 in excess of $11,000, as proposed by the Senate, and 6 between $11,000 and $25,000 each, as proposed by the House.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the following amendments of the Senate:

No. 28, relating to an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the purchase of land in the city of Washington.

No. 29, increasing the appropriation for the Tariff Commission from $300,000 to $375,000.

No. 31, relating to the authority granted the United States Shipping Board to continue to use sums received from the liquidation of assets up to $55,000,000.

WILL R. WOOD.
EDWARD H. WASON.
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the House to what the conferees have agreed to in reference to the salaries of the Shipping Board officials. The House has twice gone on record as not voting salaries in excess of $25,000. When this was up on the 15th of March the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] expressed himself upon this particular proposition and, I think, convinced the House that we might put a limitation of $25,000 upon any salary paid by the Shipping Board, yet the conferees have agreed for some reason or other to permit them to pay four officials between $25,000 and $35,000, and unless the report is recommitted or defeated the House will go on record here as reversing the action taken upon two former occasions. Now, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the Shipping Board is in a very serious tangle and they have very important matters before it, but I do not believe the Shipping Board is bigger than the Government of the United States, and I do not believe it has any problems any more serious to handle than other departments or branches of the Government. I do not believe that we ought to pay to one man a sum almost equivalent to the salary of three Cabinet officers.

And, furthermore, I think these officials ought to be content with the honor of the position. We are told that other Government officials must take part of their compensation in the honor and dignity of serving their Government. During the war we were told that men came down here at nominal salaries from patriotic motives, and we ought to have a little patriotism during peace times. And, in fact, one of the officials of the Shipping Board, who has recently left the service and who did great work in reorganizing the Emergency Fleet Corporation, came down to Washington and worked, I believe, for a dollar a month. He is Mr. Powell, formerly of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation and of the Fore River Shipbuilding Corporation. He was vice president in charge of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. And I hope we will say to the Shipping Board, "You have got to get along without four $35,000 beauties upon your pay roll." [Applause.] "You have got to handle these matters with men with a salary not in excess of $25,000, and if those men will not accept that and are unwilling to work for that stipend, let them withdraw from your service and you will find plenty of other men who will be willing to handle these matters."

I appreciate the fact that legislation is a matter of compromise, but it seems to me here is a pretty serious principle involved, and if we agree to $35,000 as a salary to these officials we are establishing a very dangerous precedent, and one that will be thrown at us in the future when other departments come before us and ask to have temporary legal assistance or executive assistance. They will say, "This question is just as vital as that involved in the Shipping Board, and we ought to give these men $26,000 or $35,000 a year."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Shipping Board is evidently making headway and progress in adjusting its affairs, and I suppose we will be told, although we passed the measure providing for Government aid to the merchant marine, that they will be able to speed up and wind up its business and get out of this mess that the war has brought upon us. But in order to do that, I do not think that Congress is in a very enviable position if we provide the salaries called for in the conference report. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, after a very full discussion by the House, in which this matter was thoroughly gone over, we made this provision with regard to the matter of salaries in the Shipping Board. We said that not more than six officers or employees of the United States Shipping Board should be paid an annual salary in excess of $11,000, and that no compensation should be paid to exceed $25,000. The Senate amended the House provision with this kind of a statement:

> Not more than 13 officers or employees shall be paid an annual salary or compensation in excess of $11,000.

So that the Senate provision was that 13 officers could be paid any salary above $11,000 that the Shipping Board thought fit to give them. In other words, the sky was the limit. Now, I realize the fact that if we take that as a basis our conferees have made a very considerable reduction in the interest of economy, and this is the substitute they have agreed upon. They have agreed now that no officer or employee of the Shipping Board shall be paid a salary or compensation in excess of $11,000, except the following: Six in excess of $11,000 each, but not in excess of $25,000 each; four in excess of $25,000 each, but not in excess of $35,000 each.

Now, gentlemen, having in memory the statements that have been made in the hearings by the representatives of the Shipping Board, we know what that will mean. It will mean the limit on each provision. In other words, it will mean that six men will not be paid anything less than $25,000 a year, and it means that four will not be paid anything less than $35,000 a year. Gentlemen, this is not the judgment of the committee or the House. I realize the fact that the committee think they have probably done all that they could so far as conference is concerned, but it seems to me that it is our duty, unequivocally and almost, if not entirely, unanimously, to say that the House will not agree to such a provision. [Applause.] It seems to me that it is our duty to say to the Shipping Board and to the gentlemen who have brought in this conference report, "You must have some respect for the judgment of the House regarding this matter." I think anyone reading the debate here in the committee and in the House, anyone who has gone through the matter as carefully as gentlemen did who sat during the entire hearings and then gave us the benefit of their advice and interpretation, and anyone who read the cold statements of fact that were made by the representatives of the Shipping Board, must realize that these salaries are not only excessive but they are ridiculously so, and that they are indefensible. I do not see how anyone with a regard for economy, that we all profess we are trying to practice here, can vote to support this conference report containing the provisions that are now found in it. And so I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that we ought not to agree to it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the greatest piece of work this Government ever undertook was the construction of the Panama Canal, and we paid General Goethals, in charge of that work, $15,000 a year. But it is proposed by this conference report that we pay four men with the Shipping Board more than we pay all the Cabinet officers combined. When this bill was before the House it was repeatedly stated that the Shipping Board had two men, and only two, at a salary of $35,000 each. I do not know what the facts may be. But here is a conference report that proposes to give to them four men at $35,000 each. I appreciate the needs of the Shipping Board; I appreciate the fact that compromise is necessary in conference, but I do not believe that this House is warranted in paying a salary of $35,000 a year to anybody in the Government service short of the President. [Applause.] And we might as well say so now. [Applause.] All the good men in the world are not dead yet, and all the people who can manage the Shipping Board are not in the employ of the Shipping Board. Jobs of that kind are not so easy to obtain now; but whether they are or not, let the House say that a salary of $25,000 out of the Treasury is enough, and to do that, let us reject the conference report. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have yielded 5 minutes to each of three gentlemen on this side who desire to express their indignation. I think it only fair to give as much time to the other side. I yield 15 minutes now to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] in order that he may parcel it out among gentlemen on his side.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to yield 30 minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will divide the time equally.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is something else in this report besides the Shipping Board that some of us want to refer to, and therefore I think we ought to have some time to discuss the board. The gentleman ought to use 30 minutes of the time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield 30 minutes to your side.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, as one of the conferees I declined to sign the conference report on the ground that I did not approve of the action of the conferees on the part of the House in the surrender of the position of the House on the Senate amendment. The number 35 compromise, as proposed by the conferees, is infinitely worse than the bill in its original form. The existing law authorizes only six employees to receive salaries in excess of $11,000, and there is no maximum limit. The bill under consideration as originally reported amended existing law so as to authorize the appointment of 13 at salaries in excess of $11,000, and there was no maximum limit. After full debate in the House the reported bill was amended, and the maximum salary was limited to $25,000 and the number of employees to receive salaries over $11,000 was fixed at six. The bill went to the Senate, and the Senate amended the bill so as to restore to the bill its original provision, authorizing 13 employees with salaries in excess of $11,000 without a maximum limit. The position of the Senate has been before the House now on several occasions, and each time the House has insisted with great emphasis that the employees receiving great salaries should not exceed six and the maximum salary paid should be limited to $25,000.

I placed in the RECORD on the first occasion this bill was before the House a salary list. It was then shown under existing law two employees received $35,000 each, one $30,000, and two $25,000 each.

While the matter was pending in the Senate the Shipping Board, with little regard for the opinion of the House, gives more than two employees $35,000 each, and proposes to give four $35,000 each, and six men $25,000 each; and if this House should adopt the conference report it would indorse the proposition that the Shipping Board is contending for, that we should give salaries to the amount of $35,000 to four people, and salaries to the amount of $25,000 to six people, in the very face of the fact that this House again and again refused to sanction any such salaries.

I said it is infinitely worse than if we left the bill in its original shape, because in its original shape the responsibility rested on the Shipping Board. If we adopt the amendment as proposed by the conferees in this case, we directly sanction the proposition that four of these employees should receive $35,000 each and six of them should receive $25,000 each. We assume the responsibility which has heretofore rested with the board.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Did you ever hear of any official of the United States, either in time of peace or in war, that was paid that much salary, except the President?

Mr. HARRISON. No. Not only that, but the Department of Justice, which has bankruptcy law, which has the admiralty law, which has the criminal law, with all its branches and forms of legal questions to dispose of, does not pay over $1,000 a month to anybody. The result of indorsing such salaries will be that the Department of Justice will be before this body in very short order asking for increased compensation to their employees.

Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. If we grant the request of the Shipping Board, would not the Department of Justice be justified in coming to Congress and asking for an increase?

Mr. HARRISON. If you will read the hearings had before the Subcommittee on Appropriations, you will find that they are already asking for increased salaries to employees in the Department of Justice.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What are the duties of these men who get the $35,000 at the present time?

Mr. HARRISON. Well, they are at the heads of these various bureaus. I do not know exactly what they are—heads of various departments in the Shipping Board. But, whatever they are, the fact is that at the time this law went into effect, and when we limited the right of the Shipping Board to employ anybody over $11,000, there were a number of employees getting $15,000 and $17,000 and $20,000; and when this law went into effect reducing their salaries to $11,000 there were no resignations, and they are still at work in the Shipping Board, and very grateful to be there. If resignations do become in order, there are others to take their vacated places. There were kings before Agamemnon.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that he never heard of a Government official receiving a salary of $35,000. I understand there were certain officials under the Director General of Railroads who received salaries which ran that high. I think they ran as high as $50,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know as to that.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the rest of my time, and I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think this conference report should be voted down for several reasons. There are two very serious objections that I have to the provision relating to the Shipping Board. In the first place, I do not think that Congress ought to raise the limitation as to the number of employees who may be paid in excess of $11,000.

Gentlemen will remember that when that limitation was first put on it went on as a House provision through an amendment adopted on the floor of the House. The number of employees in the Shipping Board who might receive in excess of $11,000 was limited to three. The sundry civil bill containing the appropriation at that time went to the Senate, and the Senate adopted an amendment raising the number from 3 to 10, and then in conference a compromise was agreed upon, which I, as a member of the conference, thought was permanent, providing that 6 should be permitted to receive salaries in excess of $11,000 each. Then this bill was reported to the House, and the Committee on Appropriations of the House recommended that 13 receive in excess of $11,000, and the House by an overwhelming vote went on record fixing the number at 6. It then went to the Senate, and the Senate raised the number to 13, and now we have this provision reported by the conferees, which, as stated, makes the number 10 and provides that 4 of them may receive salaries from $25,000 to $35,000 and 6 may receive salaries from $11,000 to $25,000.

Now, as has been stated, the maximum amount will be adopted, and hence the salary of 4 of them is fixed at $35,000 and the salary of the other 6 is fixed at $25,000.

I am sure this House does not want to go on record for the first time in its history as fixing salaries at that amount for any official of the United States except the President of the United States. So I am opposed to this proposition, because in the first place it increases the number, and in the second place it fixes these high salaries and creates a precedent which will rise to mock you and permit other departments to come back later on asking for increased salaries. What is this increased number for? They tell us it is to pay attorneys in the Shipping Board. You saw in the papers the other day the picture of a lady serving as Assistant United States Attorney General of this Government. It was stated that she was handling a $45,000,000 patent case. I noticed the other day an account of a suit against the Government which is being defended by the Department of Justice, amounting to $125,000,000. and we have been told that there are claims down there which the Department of Justice must defend amounting to possibly $500,000,000 in the aggregate. Yet the Attorney General is not paying anybody in his department exceeding $1,000 a month. Yet the Shipping Board ask this Congress to give them the privilege of paying salaries ranging from $25,000 to $35,000 for some of these employees. This House by a record vote has decided that it will not increase the number above six, and I think it should stand pat and not adopt this conference report.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. What litigation has the Shipping Board?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Litigation involving claims which have been filed against the Shipping Board.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. True; but they have the determination of their own claims. The Shipping Board attorneys do not go into the Court of Claims. They simply appear before their own board.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think they appear before the court, but they are limited——

Mr. WALSH. There are admiralty suits.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are certainly of no greater importance than the claims that come before the Department of Justice, and really not so important, because these claims are largely of an accounting nature, and involve no new principles of law like many of those with which the assistant attorneys general are frequently confronted.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman kindly give us the information as to who these people are whose services are so valuable to the Government?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not recall all of their names. I know Mr. Marshall Bullitt, of whom we have heard on this floor, was formerly receiving $25,000 a year. I know that there was a Mr. Allison who was receiving $20,000 a year, and some others whose names I do not recall; but I also know that while they were getting these salaries, before Congress fixed the limitation of not exceeding $11,000, when that limitation was made they did not surrender their places or cease their connection with the Shipping Board, but they are now employed by the Shipping Board and render just as effective service, I am sure, for $11,000 a year as they did at the larger salaries, and I dare say they will continue to hold their places there. If not, then there are others equally as competent who will take their places.

Now, there is another feature of this report to which I wish to refer briefly, and that is the one relating to the General Accounting Office. I have wondered whether this Congress is to decide what shall be fair salaries for the Accounting Office or whether or not that is to be turned over to the Accounting Office. Gentlemen will remember that when the bill was reported here in the first instance it carried an appropriation in a lump sum of $2,500,000 for salaries and contingent expenses in the General Accounting Office. This House, when the matter was called to its attention, promptly passed an amendment by an overwhelming majority in which it fixed those salaries and placed the employees upon a statutory basis, in exact accord with the amounts suggested in the request of the general accounting officer. Later on, when the bill went to the Senate and the lump sum was restored and the conferees reported back the Senate amendment with the recommendation that the House adopt it, this House again went on record by an overwhelming majority, declaring that this lump sum should not prevail but that the salaries of these men should be fixed as the general accounting officer originally indicated that he was going to fix them.

Now, what have the conferees reported? It is true that the conferees have placed the greater portion of them upon statutory salaries, thereby adopting in part what the House desired; but in some instances I notice they have raised the number who are to be increased—some of these chiefs of divisions. They have reduced a few salaries, they have increased others, and have increased the number of other positions; but they leave to the General Accounting Office $375,000 as a lump sum. It is but fair to say that they include a provision that he shall not pay any salary exceeding $1,800 to any clerk or stenographer or other employee out of that sum. I admit that this largely cures the objection which Members of Congress had to the original provision. But, gentlemen, I want to be on record here now as saying that I am opposed to lump sums. I know that the chief of that office says he can save money if you will give him a lump sum; but you never heard of a head of a department or bureau chief who did not make the same contention; and if you were to adopt their ideas you would give them all lump sums. I think Congress ought to keep its hand on these salaries and that they should be fixed as they were originally fixed by the House, in accord with what the general accounting officer stated when he was before the Committee as to the salaries he was going to pay and the number of those he was going to employ. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to suggest just one thought which occurs to me in connection with the discussion of this matter. I mean no reflection on anybody connected with the board, but it seems to me that any man in America, with our country in its present condition, who is not willing to serve the country for $25,000 a year is a very good man to disconnect from the public service. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it would be possible for me to add anything to the criticisms that have been heaped upon the decision of the conferees on this proposition, or those who have consented to this report. It seems to me that their conduct in this matter is indefensible. I was anxious that those who are proposing to surrender to the Senate conferees might see fit to give us some reason that actuated them in agreeing to that course of conduct. I assume that the chairman of the conference committee will give us his views before the vote on this proposition is taken. It was universally charged against the old Shipping Board under a former administration that they were guilty of great extravagance, great waste, and great confusion, but after the present gentleman, Mr. Lasker, chairman of the Shipping Board, was appointed there were great claims on the part of his friends that he was such a fine man himself and so able that he would administer the affairs in such a way as to bring order and economy out of this chaos. It seems to me that if there is an extravagant man to-day in the service of the Government of the United States, measured by his recommendation that he has made to the Congress of the United States, it is the chairman of the Shipping Board, with reference to salaries of the employees. Here is this House, after hearing all the arguments he presented before the committee, after a full and fair consideration, and by a tremendous majority, instructing in effect the House conferees to insist on the provisions carried in the House bill limiting the number to six who shall not receive a salary over $11,000, and absolutely limiting the employment of any man in excess of $25,000.

Yet the conferees come back with an agreement which they expect this House to ratify increasing the number of those who shall receive as much as $11,000 up to six, four of whom shall not receive in excess of $35,000. If you want to get some conception of the extravagance of the personnel of this Shipping Board I want to call your attention to the figures inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] in the Committee of the Whole, found on pages 1464–1471 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There are 2 men drawing salaries of $35,000; 1 a salary of $30,000; 2 of $25,000; 7 with a salary of $12,000; 15 a salary of $11,000; 1 at a salary of $10,800; 19 at a salary of $10,000; 1 with a salary of $9,500; 29 with a salary of $7,500; 7 at a salary of $6,500; 49 with a salary of $6,000; 5 with a salary of $5,500; 5 with a salary of $5,400; and 43 with a salary of $5,000.

It seems to me that the time has arrived in our duties here when we ought to undertake to show by our votes on the floor some semblance of fair and decent economy in the administration of these affairs. There seems to be no possible justification for this agreement on the part of the House conferees increasing these salaries to the tremendous amount named in the conference report. I do not believe, gentlemen of the House, that their conduct will find any substantial support on the floor. This conference report should be voted down unanimously in order to carry out the wishes of the House on this proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, how much more time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that it is destined to be recorded as history that the United States Shipping Board proved to be the rat hole down which the Wilson administration poured billions of dollars without any justifying result, and that the succeeding administration followed suit by pouring down hundreds of millions of dollars with results equally unsatisfactory. We have here a big job, and we ought to have big men at the head of it. This is the only theory upon which we can justify the payment of large salaries. Unfortunately, we have no assurance after we have paid the high salaries that we are getting the big men. The very fact, if it be a fact, that they are unwilling to serve their Government for anything like a reasonable salary as compared with other governmental salaries, is fairly good evidence that they are men, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] says, who ought to be separated from the public pay roll. [Applause.]

On examination you will probably find that in every case these men are men made of common clay very much like other mortals. A recent experience with one of these inordinately high-salaried individuals more than demonstrated this conclusion. It was brought to my attention that in one department of the Shipping Board there were a number of surplus employees whose aggregate salaries amounted to something near $200,000 a year, whose services could be dispensed with without affecting the efficiency of the department. I learned that a list of these surplus employees, whose salaries ranged from $10,000 down, had been submitted to one of these over $25,000 men more than a month before, with the request that they be taken off the pay roll. Finally two other Members of this House joined me in calling upon the high-salaried official in order that he might verify or explain the situation. He admitted the facts as stated and informed us that he would take steps to let them go, but thought it would take six months to work it out. So far as I have been informed, about the only person whose services he has dispensed with thus far is the one man in the department who had the courage and the common honesty to report the list of unnecessary employees and ask for their discharge. This seems to have been an offense that could not be overlooked, and he was let go, but do not forget that nearly two months had elapsed since he had dared give the information, and yet this official drawing a salary of more than $25,000 sat supinely while a considerable number of surplus employees were drawing pay from the Treasury without rendering commensurate service, some of them receiving salaries as high as $10,000. This is the kind of men for whom we are asked to provide salaries equal to almost three times the salary of a Cabinet officer. I am opposed to it. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can add anything to enlighten the House on this subject; in fact, I believe the House is very nearly unanimous on it now that the salaries are too large and that it will vote accordingly. I have been thinking of late that not only Congress but that the people generally are reckoning the ability of men by the amount of money they draw in their salary or income. Many men in this country would enjoy a position of this kind if they were paid far less money than men are now receiving, and men just as capable. I have no doubt that you have in your own district men who could perform this work just as well as these men perform it, and who would feel that it is an honor to serve the Government for far less money. Men are not always in the game for the dollar. Many men on the floor of this House can go back and earn twice the salary that they get here, but they are here because they like the occupation and they like the work. There are men in the shipping business in this country who do not demand these positions merely for the dollars and cents, but they are in the shipping business because they have been brought up in it; they like the occupation and they like the work. Recently we were passing a revenue bill and men on the floor of the House said that if we taxed the multimillionaires of this country too much they would withdraw from business, that they would not continue, and we would then lose not only the occupation for various employees but the enterprise and the work of those men who are engaged in conducting big business; that they would quit, put their money in quiet investments, and cease to give employment to the thousands. Every man engaged in big business in this country is not engaged in it merely for the dollars and cents there is in it, but he likes it and he performs that occupation because that is the business that he enjoys. I believe we can find men who would feel it an honor to serve the Shipping Board, men who would be proud of a Government position to make a record for the Shipping Board at far less salary; they would not be looking merely at the dollars and cents; they would not measure their work by the dollar mark, but by a living salary with efficient work. I believe plenty of them can be found, not only in your district and in my district, but I believe there are men in the Shipping Board itself who will perform that work for less money. We have to draw the line somewhere, and I know of no better time or place than to start on this bill to-day and eliminate these exorbitant salaries. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, with the statement that my colleague has made an inquiry of the Railroad Administration office and has been informed that the high salaries paid there were $25,000 a year during the war, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am opposed to raising salaries under existing conditions generally, and if I had carte blanche authority to raise salaries among United States Government employees, the Shipping Board would not need to look to me for a long, long time. When I came to Congress I was apprised of the fact that there was a rotten condition there, and I am frank to say that it is getting "no better fast." About as good proof of the condition that exists in the Shipping Board to-day is the demand that they are making of this Congress for these outrageous and unconscionable salaries under the conditions under which they are working. Think of a man who says that he is big and broad, who says that he is a big business man, that he knows the institution that he is managing, and that is managing that institution at a loss in Government money every day, sitting down there and howling at Congress to get Congress to raise his salary! [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the head of this organization himself, Mr. Lasker, was found for $12,000 a year. The President did find a man big enough for $12,000 a year to head this organization, and I do believe that the head of the organization, if he will make any kind of a search, can find men big enough to be his subordinates for a little more than twice the amount of the salary he gets, or $25,000 a year, maximum.

I do not care to be personal in any of these matters, but I know that the distinguished chairman of this committee is going to tell us what a wonderful job of work they are doing and what wonderful men they have there, and I want to precede his statement of the great work that they are doing with the fact that one of their $30,000 employees was the vice president of a $12,000,000 concern that went broke. That is the kind of reputation that he brought to the Shipping Board to get his $30,000 a year out of the Government.

I do not believe it is good psychology in respect to the public, I do not believe it is good politics, when the people are as restless as they are on account of the slow headway we are making in cutting down the expenses of the Government, to pursue the course that has been suggested here. The American public does not fully appreciate that it takes a long time to cut down expenses. We can not get down from a war basis to a peace basis in a period of 12 months, but we do know that we can cut salaries from $35,000 to $25,000 a year without doing very great damage. Charles Evans Hughes has done as great work as any man in America, and he did it for $12,000 a year.

It is not fair to say that he was prompted solely by the honor that he gets out of being Secretary of State. While it is a great honor to be a successful Secretary of State, it is also a great honor to take hold of an institution in as chaotic condition as the Shipping Board and out of that chaos bring order, system, efficiency, so that the Government can maintain its line of ships on a paying basis.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if there is anybody here who wants to air his objections to this item and has not done it, it is his fault.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me just one minute?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, in justice to the gentleman from Indiana, I hardly think he is very anxious for the House to accept the conference report, and in support of this belief I wish to read to the House a statement which the gentleman made recently in reference to the action of the Shipping Board in this very matter we are now discussing. On page 4934 of the RECORD the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] said:

I am criticizing and will continue to criticize this board——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman give the date of that?

Mr. OLIVER (continuing the reading):

for the exorbitant fees they are proposing to pay, unjustifiable in my opinion——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Give the date of that.

Mr. OLIVER (continuing the reading):

I maintain that instead of paying——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Under leave to extend, I wish to set out the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] on August 12, 1921, when the House was discussing the payment of these large salaries by the Shipping Board. Mr. WOOD used at that time this language in reference to the Shipping Board:

I am criticizing and will continue to criticize this board for the exorbitant fees they are proposing to pay, unjustifiable in my opinion. I maintain that instead of paying these men $25,000 and $35,000 a year for expert lawyers they could have gone into the State of Virginia, the State of Indiana, the State of Illinois, or almost any State, into any town of 5,000 inhabitants, and could have gotten men who have never received $10,000 a year in their lives who are as good, if not better, lawyers than any of the high-priced gentlemen who have been selected. They are paying these men simply because they happen to belong to some high-priced firm with an established reputation.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I will not give the gentleman any more time.

Mr. OLIVER. Page 4934 of the RECORD in which the gentleman criticized them for paying these very fees.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has made that speech three different times before this body and I hope that all have heard it. It is a pretty good time to call back to the attention of those who have the best interests of their country at heart the speech delivered by Benjamin Franklin when they were first to take the vote on whether they would accept or reject the Constitution of the United States. In that speech Benjamin Franklin referred to those who had frequently criticized him for changing his opinion, and he gave emphasis to a phrase that will be memorable for all time, to the effect that fools never change their opinion and men of reason sometimes do.

I feel to-day a good deal like the second lieutenant that my good friend FORDNEY tells so much about, and I expect that I am about in the predicament that he was in, but I have the confidence of knowing that I come to you with what has been convincing to me concerning this situation.

When you gentlemen were in power you had six directors of the Shipping Board. They all failed, many of them ignominiously, with a loss of more than $3,000,000,000 to the Government of the United States. We have had one. I am sufficiently within his confidence to know that if it were not for the fact that he has never yet placed a zero opposite his name he would go out to-morrow. I know that misery loves company. Some gentlemen here would like to see this man fail because their friends failed. There is not much consolation in that character of logic for the good of the United States.

I have repeatedly said to you that I am as much opposed to these high salaries as you are, and if this were a governmental affair I would stand here in opposition with you to-day against these large salaries. I am opposed to them. But this is not a governmental affair. Now, let us be reasonable. Let us suppose that by some good chance we, who would like to see a merchant marine established in this country, flying the flag of the United States, as it did once, the envy of the world, should have this responsibility turned over to us, what would be our first thought? To get the best men at the head of these different responsibilities that we could possibly get.

Now, you talk about a $35,000 salary being paid governmental officials. No such amount has been paid as salaries, but larger amounts have been paid as special fees. You know and I know, and you gentlemen on this side will remember it for a long time, that many district attorneys resigned during the last administration in order that they might have special employment that gave them as much as $100,000 in fees. I know of more than half a dozen that did this, and some here would like to see that thing prevail. If this was a governmental establishment, I would say with you that no such precedents should be set. But it is not. It is a temporary thing at best. We are trying to evolve some scheme whereby we can turn this business over into the hands of business men with foresight enough and patriotism enough and business sagacity enough to make it what it should be as a private enterprise. And you are trying to kill it before its birth. The responsibility is yours.

And I say to you now that I want you to say to me and to your conferees what it is you desire. If you want to hamstring this thing, do it. Do not thrust your responsibility upon me or upon these conferees. Conferences are always a matter of compromise. We attempted to make a compromise. We come back to you and meet with your derision. Now you must take the responsibility.

You have the right to say to us how far we shall go and no farther. Yours shall be the responsibility and not ours. It is for you to say to the world, "We have not only had six, but seven failures—six Democrats and one Republican—in running this Shipping Board administration. It is your responsibility and not ours. It is the hope of those who are in charge of this responsibility that within the year, and with the proper organization, this thing may be turned over to private enterprise. Now, is it not the part of prudence, of wisdom, to trust those who are charged with this responsibility rather than take it on ourselves, when we know nothing of the intricacies of the business? It is a very important matter for us each individually to determine.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have great respect for the gentleman and his character and integrity. He stated to us just now that wise men sometimes change their minds and fools do not. Will the gentleman give us the reason why he changed his mind?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will tell you why. It is because I was convinced that these gentlemen had a problem with which there was nothing to be compared. There is nothing comparable with it in our experience——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Were not those facts before you when you gave the former opinion?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They were not. I was never placed in a position where I had the information that we now have. And I commend to you the report in the hearings which was made by these gentlemen. This is the biggest business on the face of the earth. Talk about your great steel industry; talk about your United State Steel Corporation, or the Amalgamated, and they are drops in the bucket as compared with the magnitude of the Shipping Board. So we have nothing with which to compare it. And I do not want to take upon my shoulders the responsibility of saying to these men who have given a year in investigating the magnitude of this thing that I know more about it than they do.

Ben Franklin did not know, and he was willing to submit to posterity and the good, calm judgment of the American people whether or not the Constitution would survive. That Constitution which has become the admiration of the world, with few faults as compared with its virtues, was doubted by Franklin.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will my friend tell me if this amendment is agreed to if the Shipping Board intends to employ men who are not in the service now, or merely increase the salary of those already in the service?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My understanding is this: That they need above all things somebody to place at the head of the insurance department. They lost over $250,000 last year because they did not have somebody there who knew about that business. My understanding is that they will employ at least one competent admiralty lawyer that they so greatly need.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is it not the intention to pay larger salaries to those now in the employ of the Shipping Board?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; not if they can keep them at their present salaries.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the conference report to the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to recommit the conference report to the conferees.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Whether or not it is proper to consider with reference to the motion submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts an instruction to the conference committee?

The SPEAKER. Of course, if this motion carries it recommits the whole matter to the conference committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit, adding instructions to the managers on the part of the House not to agree to any proposition involving the payment of a salary of more than $25,000 a year.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I accept the amendment.

Mr. MANN. And on that I move the previous question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, what is the motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], having accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], moves to recommit the conference report to the conferees with instructions not to agree to any salaries in excess of $25,000, and on that the gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Under the amendment there were only six that received $25,000. Would not the gentleman's amendment authorize the conferees agree to salaries of $25,000 to more than six?

Mr. MANN. It would. I suppose it may be necessary to have some ground for compromise in order to get on with respect to other things. But that conference report will have to come back to the House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It puts the House in a rather inconsistent attitude to say that they may do that and come back.

Mr. MANN. The conferees understand the sentiment of the House. I would not undertake to say whether it would be six or seven in a compromise. If I felt that way about it, I would try to instruct the conferees of the House to agree to no change in the House amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would suggest that the gentleman consent to do that.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that is the way to accomplish anything in a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves the previous question on recommitting the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, could an amendment be offered?

The SPEAKER. Of course not. No amendment could be offered to the motion for the previous question.

Mr. HARRISON. I mean an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Of course not, if the previous question is agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the previous question should be voted down, then it will be in order to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Chair is aware of that fact. The question is on the motion to order the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 63.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects to the vote because there is no quorum present. It is apparent that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. As many as are in favor of the motion for the previous question will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 181, nays 89, not voting 160, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to recommit the conference report.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH), there were—ayes 162, noes none.

Accordingly the conference was recommitted.

The announcement of the result was received with applause.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The motion to recommit having prevailed, does not that carry the entire matter with it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is rather disposed to think that inasmuch as the bill has to go back to the conferees with the conference report, that would carry with it the whole subject matter.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not think that is the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman, because the question may not be entirely free from doubt.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The vote we have just had is with reference to the conference report. There are some two or three questions that are in disagreement, but it would be very advantageous to the conferees to know what the opinion of the House is with reference to these questions which are in disagreement. It would be at least a saving of time.

Mr. WALSH. We have just recommitted the conference report. The papers being in the possession of the House, of course when the motion to recommit passes, theoretically it carries the report and the bill back to the conferees.

The SPEAKER. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH. But the situation is such that these amendments still in disagreement can not be agreed to by the conferees in any event unless the House first takes action upon them.

Mr. MANN. Why not? They are in conference.

Mr. WALSH. They are in conference, but since we modified the rule it has been held that matters involving legislation or that are in violation of the rules of the House must first be voted upon by the House.

Mr. MANN. Practically they can not agree, but theoretically the committee of conference can agree to them because they are in conference.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think theoretically they can agree.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state to the gentleman that with reference to the matters that are in dispute the conferees are in agreement; but under the rules we have to bring these questions back to the House eventually, so that it would simply be a waste of time to send them back to the conferees now.

The SPEAKER. May the Chair make a suggestion? Suppose the House should agree to a Senate amendment. That Senate amendment should not go to the conferees. Yet the bill and the conference report are in the hands of the conferees.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the House has disagreed to all of the Senate amendments that are not yet disposed of, and these amendments have already been sent to conference. The House just recommitted the conference report and all of those amendments are now in the hands of the conferees.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair thinks.

Mr. MANN. Now, how can the House act upon one of those amendments that has been sent to conference? It is in conference.

Mr. DOWELL. And it is not before the House at all now.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair was stating.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the House recommitted the report to the committee of conference. These amendments are included in the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would undoubtedly save time if we could vote on these amendments now, but the Chair finds it difficult to see how the House can legally do it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the conferees reported these things on which there is a disagreement. Upon the matters upon which there was an agreement the House has disagreed and sent the report back. Now, there are things upon which there is still a disagreement. The House as a business proposition ought to conduct this matter in a businesslike way. For the purpose of saving time we at least ought to have the idea of the House on these matters of disagreement, so that when we go back we can have an idea of what the House wants.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the fact that it would save time, but the trouble is how to overcome the objections. The Chair does not see, inasmuch as the bill and report go back to conference, how you can separate the matters in disagreement from the bill.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TILSON. Is it correct that before the committee of conference acted upon the report it would have been within the authority of the conferees on the part of the House to have accepted the other amendments still in disagreement? The House having just had an opportunity to act upon the amendments, and having recommitted the entire subject matter, report, and bill, would the conferees now have the authority to agree to these amendments without further action on the part of the House?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that they could agree to the other amendments.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that the amendments could not be agreed to by the House.

Mr. TILSON. No; by the conferees on the part of the House. I wish to know whether the status of these amendments has been changed by the action of the House just taken.

Mr. MANN. Not under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that only by unanimous consent could you get the opinion of the House. There might be unanimous consent given to permit the House to consider under the new rule whether it would give its conferees authority to come to an agreement on these Senate amendments.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I was anxious to assist the conferees on the part of the House to dispose of these questions that must be decided by the House, and therefore I have been inclined to hope that it would be proper to take these questions up and pass on them at this time. But on full consideration, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how that can be done under the rules, and I think it would be of doubtful wisdom to attempt to do it by unanimous consent as matters now stand. We would like to see these other questions decided and disposed of, but the conference report is in fact in the hands of the conferees and not before the House, and it does not seem to me that it would be good practice to consider them even by unanimous consent. It would be difficult to report such action if taken, and we might establish a questionable precedent and find ourselves in serious difficulty in the future if in this state of affairs we attempted to take any further action on the matters in controversy between the two Houses.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, the action of the House has resulted in refusing to receive the report and therefore we can not take any action on anything that is contained in it. We must wait now for whatever action the conferees agree upon when they make a further report to the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I suppose what the Chair has said amounts to a practical ruling on the parliamentary inquiry I made.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair rules that the matter has all gone to conference.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Department of the Interior appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

On No. 81: Restores the appropriation of $100,000 for the investigation of water storage on the lower Colorado River, modified so as to make that sum available for the investigation of irrigation, water storage, and related problems on the Colorado River, and for investigations of water sources of said river.

LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
C. D. CARTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CRAMTON rose.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order against the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is too late to make a point of order.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, the point of order that the gentleman from California is going to make is in order at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the point of order must be made before the conference report is acted upon. I think the Speaker will find precedents to confirm the position I take that the point of order either must be made before the conference report is read or immediately after it has been concluded. The reading of the conference report has been dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The agreement was that the statement should be read in lieu of the report. If it was read in lieu of the report, would not that allow the point of order to be made?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the statement is virtually proceeding with a discussion of the conference report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If the statement is read in lieu of the report, I think the precedents are that the point of order must be made before the statement is read.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the point that I make—that the point of order made by the gentleman from California comes too late. The theory of that is that the statement is a virtual discussion of the report, as it is in fact a written discussion, instead of an oral discussion. It is a written discussion explaining the purpose of the report. It has always been my practice, when I wanted to make points of order against a conference report, to make the point of order even before the conference report was read, and there are precedents to that effect.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, but the present Speaker has ruled, as I recall, that where the unanimous-consent request is that the statement be read in lieu of the report, the proper time for making the point of order is at the conclusion of the reading of the statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. But there should have been a reservation of the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there should be some stability to the rulings of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. There should be a reservation of the point of order at least. When we proceed with the reading of the statement in lieu of the report we proceed to a discussion of the conference report. The reading of the report has been waived.

Mr. WINGO. But the only thing waived is the reading of the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. And all of the rights connected with the reading of the report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the gentleman from Arkansas to say that the present Speaker had ruled that a point of order could be made upon the completion of the reading of the statement?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; that is my recollection.

Mr. WALSH. On the contrary, he has made just the opposite ruling several times.

Mr. WINGO. To a specific inquiry addressed to the Speaker upon one occasion whether the point of order should be made prior to the reading of the statement when read in lieu of the report——

Mr. STAFFORD. The reading of the report.

Mr. WINGO. Will not the gentleman permit me to conclude my statement to the Speaker? The Speaker held then, not upon a specific ruling, it is true, but it amounted to the same, that the House had the choice of expediting matters and that it might waive the reading of the report and have the statement read, and the status remained the same. I do not recall the bill, but if the gentlemen deny it, we will find it.

The object of waiving the reading of the report is for convenience, to save the time of the House. In other words, read one thing or the other, and then reach the point where a point of order could be made, because the matter is not presented before the House so that it is ready for the point of order until the conclusion of the reading. Could the point of order be made before the statement is read? No; but the House reads this so that the House may have a formal knowledge of what is in the report for the same reason a bill is read, and by unanimous consent the statement is read for the information of the House instead of the report. It is then that the House knows formally what is presented, and at the immediate conclusion of the reading of that statement is the time to present any objections that go to the report under the rule.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman asked me to deny a statement which he made. I do not care to enter a specific denial, but I shall make a wager with him that he can not find the precedent where the present Speaker held that a point of order can be made after the statement is read.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, under this administration I would be afraid to bet on a Republican horse, because you never can tell where you would find yourself. You might have an Executive order setting the whole thing aside.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, to follow the logic of the rule, it is just the same as when points of order are reserved on appropriation bills introduced in this House. The reservation is made before the bills are referred to the Committee of the Whole House. Furthermore, on conference reports, they should be made before even the report is considered and read, and certainly after the reading of the report has been dispensed with and an argument has been had, as it has virtually by the reading of the statement, it is too late to make the point of order. Is it to be contended that if we had proceeded to debate the conference report, and that was what was done, then the point of order could be made, as has been attempted? The gentleman from California has been sleeping on his rights.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, I have not slept yet.

Mr. STAFFORD. He should have reserved all points of order to the conference report before the statement was read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of ever having ruled on the question. The parliamentary clerk has assured him that he has not, but is now ascertaining the fact. The Chair notes astonishment on the face of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the Chair will be glad to hear any recollection that he has.

Mr. WALSH. I have a recollection, though I do not recall the bill, when a conference report was presented and some gentleman on the minority side asked the Chair if a point of order should be reserved at the time of the presentation of the conference report. The Chair stated at that time that it was not necessary to reserve the point of order at the time of the presentation of the report, that the proper time to make the point of order was after the report had been read and before the statement was read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no doubt about the rule that the proper time to make the point of order is after the reading of the report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, Speaker Clark on a number of occasions ruled—and it was necessary to only rule once—that in order to reserve the right to make a point of order where unanimous consent was asked to have the statement read in lieu of the report, if that consent were granted, it was necessary to reserve a point of order upon the conference report, because the only time that the point of order can be made is at the conclusion of the reading of the conference report. That has been the practice of the House ever since.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to the language in the Manual as found on page 231, wherein we find, midway down the page, that in the House points of order against reports are made or received after a report is read, and before the reading of the statement.

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that point.

Mr. WINGO. That is not the question here.

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that. The only one about which the Chair has any doubt is when a statement is read in lieu of a report—whether that takes the place of the report and therefore gives the right.

Mr. WALSH. Ordinarily, if the report is read the statement is not read.

The SPEAKER. Exactly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have a precedent stated in paragraph 6441, the syllabus of which states that the point of order should be made on the conference report before the statement is read.

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the uniform practice that the statement is read in lieu of the report, and the Speaker knows many times, I believe, in his experience here, that when a statement is read in lieu of a report the reservation of the point of order is made prior to the reading of the statement in order to save the rights of the Members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the parliamentary clerk that the Chair has never ruled on this question, and no authority is cited for allowing it after the statement, and the gentleman from Illinois states that Speaker Clark explicitly ruled in such cases that the point of order must be reserved. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the report offered to the House by the conferees upon this appropriation bill is an agreement upon a large number of items in the bill. As to some other items the conferees did not have the authority to enter into an agreement by reason of the House rules, and as to those amendments due action will be taken after the report is disposed of. Following the adoption of the report of the conferees, if the House sees fit to adopt it, and following the action that the conferees hope to see taken with reference to those amendments where the conferees lack authority, there will then remain in disagreement between the House and the Senate only three matters—first, the appropriation for the Grand Canyon National Park; second, the increase of $100,000 proposed by the Senate for land-survey work; and third, a group of 10 amendments with reference to the Reclamation Service, wherein the Senate proposed an increase of $1,500,000 for reclamation over the amount proposed by the House.

The bill as passed by the Senate proposed a net increase of $3,117,839.30 over the House bill. The amendments as agreed upon by the conferees involve a recession upon the part of the House, first, for $459,840 for the Patent Office. By reason of the Lampert bill, which recently passed Congress and which increased the compensation and the force for the Patent Office, this increase is necessary, and the increase which your conferees have agreed to is only the increase made necessary by the Lampert bill. That is $459,840 of the increase accepted by the House conferees. In addition to that your conferees have accepted increases aggregating $305,135 for a number of items, and are going to ask the House to accept $112,500 of further increase on items where the House conferees did not have authority to act.

Therefore the House conferees, out of this total of something better than $3,000,000 added by the Senate, are asking you this afternoon to accept increases amounting to $417,635 other than the Patent Office increase.

The Senate have agreed to recessions on their part amounting to $816,864.30.

Now, Mr. Speaker, unless there is some question with reference to particular items——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why do the conferees strike out the appropriation for the maintenance of the Grand Canyon National Park?

Mr. CRAMTON. The conferees have not stricken that out. That item was stricken out by the Senate, and in conference we did not reach an agreement. The conferees are going to ask the House to further insist on a disagreement and to go back to conference upon that item.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say that. That park, in the opinion of travelers generally, is the most wonderful natural object in the world, and it ought to be carefully watched and maintained by the Government.

Mr. CRAMTON. I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I think a great deal of the difficulty that we have experienced in regard to that item has been based upon a misunderstanding of the situation, and we are very hopeful that a result will eventually be secured that will be quite satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin and other friends of the parks.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. As I understood the statement of the gentleman, the four hundred thousand dollars and odd was made necessary by the passage of the bill increasing the compensation of the employees of the Interior Department?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes. That amount we really could not argue about.

Mr. SISSON. Then you add sundry items that aggregate about $300,000?

Mr. CRAMTON. Three hundred and five thousand dollars that we have agreed to accept.

Mr. SISSON. And the Senate has receded on items aggregating——

Mr. CRAMTON. Eight hundred and sixteen thousand dollars.

Mr. SISSON. I understand that the total difference between the House and the Senate was $3,000,000 and odd?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. How do you account for that?

Mr. CRAMTON. There is one group of amendments in reference to the Reclamation Service, of $1,500,000, in disagreement, in which we want to ask the House to further disagree.

Mr. SISSON. I see. That difference accounts, practically, for the whole thing?

Mr. CRAMTON. There is a difference of $100,000 in another item.

M. STEENERSON. What became of the provision which the Senate put on the bill with reference to registrars and receivers in land offices? I supposed that was one of the items in disagreement.

Mr. CRAMTON. No. The Senate accepted the House provisions in the main. There were one or two amendments put on by the Senate. Agreements were reached as to them, and those are included in the report now pending before the House.

Mr. STEENERSON. What is the change from the way the House passed the bill on that subject?

Mr. CRAMTON. The Senate language puts in an express provision with respect to Spokane, Seattle, and Vancouver. It does not change the purposes of the House committee, but clears up the situation. Then the Senate also originally proposed to save the Springfield, Mo., office, and the Senate have receded as to that.

Mr. STEENERSON. The two offices will be consolidated; the offices of register and receiver will be consolidated in one office?

Mr. CRAMTON. There was no disagreement between the House and the Senate as to that in the main. The effect of the House provision was to cut out about 15 of those offices entirely and in about 20 or more offices to effect a consolidation, so that from 35 to 40 offices were affected; but the Senate language is identical with the House language as to that. There is nothing in conference on that subject except as I have indicated.

Mr. STEENERSON. What was the change with reference to the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota? I noticed there was something as to that.

Mr. CRAMTON. An amendment was put on by the Senate, from which the Senate receded, with reference to the survey of timber. The Senate has receded as to that. I am frank to say that there was a feeling in conference that if the delegation in Congress from Minnesota can get together to solve all that question with respect to the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota it will be desirable. The other amendment on which we ask action to-day is the one that proposes to appropriate from the funds of the Chippewa Indians $46,570 for school purposes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Was that one of the items that the conferees could not act upon?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes. That was one of the items that the conferees could not act upon. We must ask a separate vote on it to-day.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. I just wanted to let the gentleman know that there were two or three gentlemen on this side who would like to have something to say on the conference report. It would take about 20 minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to call the attention of my colleague to the lateness of the hour and to the fact that we would like to dispose of the conference report this afternoon.

Mr. CARTER. Well, give us 15 minutes.

Mr. CRAMTOM. I will yield that amount of time to my colleague.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that I have sent to the editor of the New York World a copy of a speech that I made here in the House. In Sunday's issue of that paper they misquote me in many particulars. I have asked the editor to hew to my speech delivered here in the House and correct his misquotations. I wanted to say that for the information of gentlemen who may have seen the article in the New York World.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one minute?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to occupy that minute, or a portion of it, in calling attention to the effect of the legislation which passed the House some time ago relative to the Patent Office. It seems that that legislation will increase the appropriations for salaries in the Patent Office $1,951,340 the first full year that it is in operation—$2,000,000 increase, practically, in one comparatively small bureau of the Government. If we were to increase the expenses of the Government at that rate in all the bureaus of the Government, it would, I am certain, run considerably beyond $100,000,000 of increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman acquainted with the letter printed in the New York Times from the former Commissioner of Patents, Mr. Ewing, in which he urged upon those who favored an increase in the Patent Office to continue their agitation in favor of the Lehlbach bill, so as to increase still more the salaries provided for in the Lampert bill, so called?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not familiar with any such letter, if such there was, and I assume there was from what the gentleman says.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the letter.

Mr. MONDELL. If anyone wrote such a letter, he thereby proclaimed himself either an exceedingly reckless person or an extraordinarily ignorant one, because, as a matter of fact, the Lehlbach bill would not have increased the cost of the force in the Patent Office in any such amount as the bill that we did pass; and the proof of that is to be found in the fact that the friends of that increase, if they believed that the Lehlbach bill would bring a larger increase than the other bill, would have simply amended the Lehlbach bill so as to make it immediately operative as to the Patent Office.

Mr. STAFFORD. You know the friends of the other bill realized that the Lehlbach bill did not have any chance in the other body.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BARBOUR. I would like to ask the gentleman why the item of $38,878.10 for sanitary purposes in General Grant National Park, Calif., was stricken out by the conferees? That was an amendment put in by the Senate.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; that was an amendment. It was not originally before the House. The estimate came in after the bill was considered in the House. I think it only proper to say that in considering the increases put in the bill for national parks by the Senate the conferees came to an agreement as to the general amount of increase, and then followed, with one exception, the advice of the Director of the National Park Service as to the items that were most urgent. That did not happen to be one of those deemed most urgent.

Mr. BARBOUR. Can the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this bill give me any information as to the probability of this item being accepted and incorporated in an appropriation bill in the near future?

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not know what the gentleman calls the near future, but I should say that a year from now it would receive very serious consideration.

Mr. BARBOUR. I appreciate that information very much, because the sanitary situation in General Grant National Park is a very serious matter. The health officer of Fresno County, Calif., in which a large portion of the park is situated, has been up there, and he has advocated closing the park unless something is done to relieve that condition.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say that, generally speaking, in the park items your committee were quite liberal with items for sanitation, appreciating their importance, but they could not take care of all of them this year.

Mr. BARBOUR. This General Grant National Park consists of 4 square miles, and the camping facilities are all in a little restricted part of the area. Thirty thousand people were in the park this last year, so that shows the necessity of having these matters properly attended to. Is the same thing true as to the appropriation for Sequoia?

Mr. CRAMTON. For Sequoia, the same situation exactly.

Now I yield 15 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], to yield to other Members.

Mr. CARTER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, Mark Smith once said:

> The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona offers to man the most stupendous wonder on the whole surface of the earth for his contemplation and enjoyment. God put it there for people to see.

The tongue of man can never form words to describe the glories of that mighty gorge. The eye alone can convey an impression of its vastness and its ever-changing beauties. The Grand Canyon can rightfully be called the greatest of the national parks, and it is the duty of Congress to make it accessible to increasing thousands of Americans who are learning to love their country more because they know it better.

For some unaccountable reason it is proposed that no appropriation be made for the maintenance and improvement of the Grand Canyon National Park during the next fiscal year. This failure to provide funds will still leave every acre of it a national park because Congress has by law dedicated and set apart this area for the benefit and enjoyment of the American people. That law contemplated that Congress would provide money to build roads and trails and make other improvements in order that the public may have better access to its many recreational, scientific, and educational attractions. Since it is a national park, what justification can there be for discriminating against the Grand Canyon when much larger sums than $88,000 are carried in this bill to be expended in the improvement of other national parks? For example, $361,800 is here appropriated for the Yellowstone National Park, $280,000 at Yosemite, and $178,700 for the Glacier National Park in Montana.

No proposal to establish a national park has received more careful consideration than the legislation to create the Grand Canyon National Park. The first bill with that object in view was introduced in the Senate on January 5, 1886, by the late ex-President Benjamin Harrison, then a Senator from Indiana. Other bills were proposed from time to time, but none of them were enacted.

The basis for the act to establish the Grand Canyon National Park is to be found in a bill (H. R. 20447) which I introduced in the House on January 24, 1917, after much correspondence with my constituents and numerous conferences with the officials of the Departments of the Interior and of Agriculture. An identical bill (S. 8250) was introduced in the Senate on February 14, 1917, by Senator ASHURST. These bills were referred to the Governor of Arizona, the Arizona State Land Commission, the Board of Supervisors of Coconino County, Ariz., and to many other citizens of that State for criticism and suggestions, but the Sixty-fourth Congress adjourned without action on these measures by either House.

In the Sixty-fifth Congress Senator ASHURST introduced the bill (S. 390) which was reported to the Senate by Senator Mark Smith on March 21, 1918, and passed that body on May 16. On October 18 I reported the bill to the House from the Committee on the Public Lands in a form which met every substantial objection to the creation of a national park at the Grand Canyon. The bill, which had the unanimous indorsement of the Arizona State Legislature, passed the House and became a law on February 26, 1919. In a statement explaining the purpose of that measure I said:

> The area of the present Grand Canyon National Monument is 1,260 square miles, but the proposed park will contain only 996 square miles, so that 264 sections of land that are now withdrawn from all forms of entry will be made available for grazing and other uses. It is the intention of the bill that nothing but the scenic portions of the canyon, with sufficient areas back from the rim to permit the construction of roads, shall be included within the national park.
> It is believed that by the establishment of a national park at the Grand Canyon the way will be paved for securing appropriations by Congress for the construction of roads and trails which will make the canyon much more accessible to visitors. Over 100,000 tourists visited the Grand Canyon in 1915, and large numbers are certain to come each year, particularly if good roads are constructed so that automobiles can drive along the rim and view the greatest natural wonder in the world.

Having sponsored the creation of this national park, I have naturally been interested to see that appropriations were made for its development. The first sum allowed in 1919 was but $40,000, which was increased to $60,000 in 1920 and to $100,000 in 1921.

This year the Budget Bureau asked that the appropriation be again fixed at $100,000, but the Commitee on Appropriations recommended that but $88,000 be allowed, and that sum was agreed to by the House. The Senate Committee on Appropriations increased the total to $90,500, but the whole appropriation was stricken from the bill, which is the occasion for having this item in conference and under discussion to-day.

The need for appropriations for this park is primarily for roads and trails. It has long been recognized that Congress should provide funds to make the Grand Canyon National Park more accessible to tourists. In June, 1909, W. R. Mattoon, of the Forest Service, submitted "A working plan for the Grand Canyon National Monument" to the Secretary of Agriculture, in which he pointed out the need for protection against forest fires and the establishment of a system of roads and trails. The following quotation contains the substance of the road plans as recommended in this report:

> The center of the tourist travel for some years in the future will remain as now between Grand View, on the east, and Dripping Springs, on the west, a distance of 30 miles along the rim. From the larger standpoint, however, the zone of travel will increase over a wider strip nearly 90 miles in length from the Little Colorado River, on the east, to Cataract Canyon, on the west.
> The ultimate road system, looking many years into the future, should consist of the following roads:
> (1) An interior road from Little Colorado River, on the east, to Cataract Canyon, on the west, touching the rim at Grand View and Hermit Basin.
> (3) Roads along rim from Hance ranch, north and east, to Navajo Point, including Moran, Zuni, Papago, and Pinal points.
> Grand View west to Hermit Basin, including Thor Hammer, Shoshone, Yaki, Yavapai, Hopi, Mohave, and Pima points.
> The length of the main interior road will be about 90 miles; the total of branches, 20 miles; the rim roads, 30 miles. The total mileage is 140 miles, and the cost of construction, estimated at $4,000 per mile, is $560,000.

It will be noted that this estimate was made in 1910, when construction costs were very much lower than at present. In my opinion, it will require more than three times $560,000 to build all the roads that are needed if the Grand Canyon National Park is to be adequately developed. The Mattoon report recommended that $107,500 be immediately appropriated by Congress for roads and trails. In a letter dated March 30, 1910, and addressed to Hon. F. W. MONDELL, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, Hon. James Wilson, the then Secretary of Agriculture, said:

> The Forest Service has caused to be prepared with great care working plans for a system of roads and trails to render all practicable parts of the Grand Canyon National Monument accessible to the public. An important feature of these plans is a road which is to follow the southern edge of the canyon far enough back to preserve the fringe of trees along the rim.
> A bill has been introduced in the House by the Hon. RALPH H. CAMERON, Delegate from Arizona—H. R. 20819—to appropriate $110,000 to be expended under the direction of this department in carrying out these plans. This bill has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and it is hoped will become a law at this session.

The Cameron bill did not become a law, but if $110,000 was needed for such improvements at the Grand Canyon in 1910 can anyone explain why $88,000 should not be expended for the same purpose during the fiscal year 1922-23? In the meantime there has occurred a tremendous development of the automobile industry, so that thousands may visit the Grand Canyon by that means of conveyance, which was available to but very few 12 years ago.

It is my desire that the Grand Canyon shall be made accessible at as many points as possible, not only to the citizens of Arizona but to thousands of others from all parts of America. I shall not be content until all practicable facilities for tourists, particularly those traveling by automobile, are provided. The greatest convenience is a system of roads entering all parts of the national park and extending for miles along the rim of the canyon. It will take some years to carry out such a development and cost considerable sums of money, but in the aggregate the amount will be no greater than has been expended in other national parks.

There should be no discrimination and no delay. I sincerely trust that the House will instruct its conferees to insist that every dollar that has been appropriated by the House shall be agreed to by the Senate. There is no other way in which this disagreement with the Senate can be justly settled.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I must feel a want of contentment in the action of the conferees. Personally, they are delightful gentlemen, and therefore this goes to the matter of principle. I refer particularly to the amendment No. 44 on page 41 of the bill placed there by the Senate for the reconstruction of a school building destroyed by fire on December 17, 1921; the Granville Indian School of California. I have heard to-day the statement regarding the savings and the difference between what the House bill was and the Senate bill—the items they have receded in and items the Senate has receded in. They talk about cutting the appropriations to the bone, and as economies these are all right, but sometimes I am thinking that they are just deceiving and deluding the people and nothing else. This cutting to the bone means nothing unless it has some relative value on the subject involved.

Here were 100 Indian children going to this school which is well equipped with 28 other buildings and all the equipment that goes with buildings for an Indian school. There is the farm, the land, the cattle, and the horses, and in the meantime while the appropriations bill is pending the building is destroyed by fire. These children have been scattered like the four winds of Heaven. Some go to Oregon, some to Nevada, and some to northern California, and some go out without anything to eat. We do not get a hearing before the conference committee. I do not know whether I have a right to criticize them for that or not, but nevertheless when an amendment is placed on a bill, an amendment that has merit, one that is dealing with the education of children, we ought to have an opportunity for a hearing. The amendment should have been agreed to by the House conferees. The children ought to receive an opportunity for education. That is all that this amendment does.

The House conferees immediately took it up but I find another item appropriating a large sum for a gymnasium. There you have a school fairly started and all the equipment, but you gave them appropriation for a gymnasium. Here are 100 Indian children in Plumas County, Calif., denied the right to go to school when the evidence has been presented here that by the middle of July this year this building could have been rebuilt and the school could have been opened, and everything started without any delay or trouble; the only closing would have been from the time the fire occurred until the end of the present school year. I am very sorry indeed for some things, and that I am placed in the position where it will not permit me to say on the floor what I want to say, but on the question of fairness, justice, and right, that is all these people want. I am very sorry that the conferees did not include this amendment in the agreement.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I regret that under the provisions of this bill the United States land office at Harrison, Ark., in my district, may be discontinued. There are contiguous to that office more than 101,000 acres of public lands subject to homestead. This office has been maintained for a number of years. It is conducted in a commodious and beautiful Federal building, where the offices of the register and receiver are located.

I know that the reason given for abolishing all but one office in Arkansas is that the Camden land office is far behind the required acreage and its cost of maintenance too much and that the Harrison land office costs 66.07 per cent of the revenue yielded by it, and that the majority have decreed that every land office in America must be discontinued if the cost of maintaining same exceeds 33⅓ per cent of the revenues of the office. I observe also that 25 or 30 other offices are abolished throughout the Nation, but I insist that the conferees provide in their final report for a continuance of this Harrison office, because I assure you that its loss will be keenly felt by prospective homesteaders in this section. It has always been the policy of the Government to encourage homesteading, and within a few miles of Harrison is a large forest reserve, which I am seeking to have thrown open by legislation to homestead, which, if done, will add greatly to the acreage already subject to entry. This Republican administration is shrieking economy, economy, and yet it is penny-wise but pound foolish. It is lavish in some directions and stingy when it comes to helping those who need help most. If this office under discussion is closed and moved to Little Rock, intending homesteaders in my district, invariably poor people, will be compelled to go two or three times as far to get to the land office as is the case now. I shall certainly insist, if but one office is allowed my State, that this office be permanently located at Harrison, because of its nearness to the great bulk of the Government's public lands.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. At the bottom of page 7 of the conference report, in the second line from the bottom, I find the words:

For continuing the widening of the Nisqually Glacier to Paradise Valley Road.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is the road that is to be widened, and not the glacier.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent now to offer one motion in respect to several items in disagreement.

Twelve or thirteen amendments are included in this motion, but they relate only to three matters, first, the addition of $100,000 proposed by the Senate for land survey work; second, the addition of one and one-half million dollars for the reclamation work; and third, the appropriation for the Grand Canyon National Park. On those three items we are asking the House to further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to consider all of those amendments in gross in order to expedite matters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the consolidation of these several amendments in one motion. The Clerk will report the several amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments numbered 43, 70, 71, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 82, and 91.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these being considered together?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what action does the gentleman intend to take in respect to the disposition of the other amendments that are in disagreement?

Mr. CRAMTON. We will take those seriatum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move as to those amendments that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I now call up Senate amendment No. 47.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 47, page 47, of the bill, after line 13, insert: "The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, in his discretion, the sum of $46,570, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the principal sum on deposit to the credit of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota arising under section 7 of the act of January 14, 1889, and to expend the same for payment of tuition for Chippewa Indian children enrolled in the public schools of the State of Minnesota: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make payments therefrom of such amounts as he deems proper and just in aid of public schools of the State of Minnesota which have enrolled Chippewa Indian children therein during the fiscal year 1922, and in excess of the rate of compensation fixed in any existing contracts with public-school districts, where such rate is inadequate."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 47 and concur in the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it proposed, if this proviso be adopted, to pursue a different policy with respect to the amounts that may be allowed to public schools for the education of Indian children?

Mr. CRAMTON. This is a case where we have already turned over to the State of Minnesota certain school buildings and certain authority is carried in this bill in respect to land and buildings, and so forth. An attempt has heretofore been made to appropriate money of the Indians for tuition in these State schools. That legislation heretofore has not become effective. This is to make a provision of that kind effective. Some contracts have been made already, due to the former attempted legislation. This will carry out that legislation. This is money taken from the tribal funds of the Indians.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much is it proposed to allow to the public-school districts in excess of the amount now provided in existing contracts, as stated in the proviso?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not the amount exactly; but it is not large, as I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. And, as I understand, we have a certain rate generally throughout the country which we pay to schools when they educate Indian children.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not sure that that is the case. I am advised by the Indian Office, in explanation of the proviso permitting payment of compensation which may in a given case be in excess of an existing contract for the fiscal year 1922, that "it is appropriate to say that in a few cases contracts have been executed at a given rate per pupil per day and in other cases have not been so executed. However, when applications were received from all districts within the Chippewa Reservation, it was found that there was not sufficient money to allow a rate of compensation which was adequate and proportionate to the actual cost of education of each pupil in some of the public schools. The contracts, then, which were executed were necessarily at a lower rate per pupil, limited by the amount of money available instead of by the equities of the case." I take it that the standard to which the gentleman refers will not be exceeded under this legislation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 50: Page 53, line 20, after the figures "$10,000" insert "for dining room and kitchen $20,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 50 and concur in the same. This is a building that is greatly needed.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 51: Page 53, line 21, strike out "$90,000" and insert "$110,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. This is simply a total, and I move that the House recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 53: Page 55, line 13, after the figures "$9,000," insert: "for construction of a gymnasium and an assembly hall, including equipment for both buildings, to replace the building destroyed by fire February 12, 1922, to be immediately available, $45,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur, with an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For construction of buildings for a gymnasium and assembly hall, including equipment to replace the building destroyed by fire February 12, 1922, $42,500, to be immediately available."

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a couple of minutes?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the attention of the House to the amendment just passed—for a "dining room and kitchen." They already have one. That is on page 53. It is all right. I believe in improving. Here on amendment 53, now, we replace a gymnasium and assembly hall that has been destroyed by fire. The rest of the school is continued. But the Indians in northern California that are entitled to relief and consideration have been deprived of their property more than any class of people in the United States to-day. When their buildings are destroyed their children are scattered, and they are not even given the opportunity to erect a new building. I hope that the conferees in this great committee the next time, particularly when it comes to the deficiency bill, will be able to have it placed in the bill before this Congress adjourns, and that the building may be completed before the next term of school in August. I believe we will be able to make such a showing that the gentleman will accede to that request because of the necessity and justice of it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on receding and concurring in the Senate amendment as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 54: Page 55 of the bill, line 16, strike out "$109,000" and insert "$154,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with the necessary amendment to make the total correct.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed in the said amendment insert "$151,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on receding and concurring in the Senate amendment as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 55: Page 62 of the bill, line 8, after the word "pupil," insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That the Osage Boarding School may be continued, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for a period not exceeding six years from July 1, 1922, and that the limit of $300 allowed per capita shall not apply to such school for the present fiscal year."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 56: Page 64 of the bill, line 14, after the word "prescribe," insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That hereafter no money shall be expended from tribal funds belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes without specific appropriation by Congress, except as follows: Equalization of allotments, per capita and other payments authorized by law to individual members of the respective tribes, tribal and other Indian schools under existing law, salaries and contingent expenses of governors, chiefs, assistant chiefs, secretaries, interpreters, and mining trustees of the tribes at salaries at the rate heretofore paid, and one attorney each for the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Creek Tribes, employed under contract approved by the President, under existing law: And provided further."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment striking out the language of the amendment and inserting the language which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to strike out the language inserted by the Senate and insert in lieu thereof the following, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That hereafter no money shall be expended from tribal funds belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes without specific appropriation by Congress: Provided further, That for the current fiscal year money may be so expended from such tribal funds for equalization of allotments, per capita and other payments authorized by law to individual members of the respective tribes, tribal and other Indian schools under existing law, salaries and contingent expenses of governors, chiefs, assistant chiefs, secretaries, interpreters, and mining trustees of the tribes at salaries at the rate heretofore paid, and one attorney each for the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Creek Tribes employed under contract approved by the President, under existing law: And provided further,

The SPEAKER. The question is on the House receding and concurring with the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 58: Page 67 of the bill, line 25, after "$20,000" insert: "For boys' dormitory, $60,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by the said amendment insert the following: "For boys' dormitory, $50,000."

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I want to make the record straight. For instance now, in this amendment No. 44, if the Senate had stood pat, the three Senators had refused to agree, it would have come back here with a disagreement? Is that correct?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think that is self-evident.

Mr. RAKER. I want the record so that there will be no question about it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would not want to embarrass any of the Senators for anything in the world.

Mr. RAKER. I do not want to embarrass anybody, but that is the procedure, is it not?

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not know of any other way it ever happens. I will say, yes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have the right to extend and revise my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman want to extend his remarks on this wonderful contribution he has made to the proceedings here?

Mr. RAKER. I do not want——

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not catch the procedure under which we are operating.

Mr. RAKER. I will have to get advice.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman needs it.

Mr. RAKER. There are others who need it as much as I do.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to recede and concur in the amendment with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 59, page 67, line 26: Strike out "$160,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$220,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$210,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. The next one is No. 72, on page 90 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 72, page 90, line 24, after the word "operation" insert the words "with authority."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House recede and concur. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 73, page 90, line 25: After the word "Reservoir" insert "to purchase or condemn and to improve suitable land for a new town site to replace the portion of the town of American Falls which will be flooded by the reservoir, and to provide for the removal of buildings to such new site and to plat and to provide for appraisal of lots in such new town site and to exchange and convey such lots in full or part payment for property to be flooded by the reservoir and to sell for not less than the appraised valuation any lots not used for such exchange."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is the Senate amendment. If the gentleman will reserve his point of order, I will say it was my purpose to move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment. If the gentleman will further withhold the point of order—and I am sure I do not know what the point would be—the language is the same as the current law, and under that the Federal court has sustained the right of the Government to proceed upon this line of work that has been entered upon. This is simply to complete work already entered upon.

Mr. WALSH. Which is in accordance with current law with reference to similar projects?

Mr. CRAMTON. This is the same project. It is the same language as the current law as to the Minidoka project.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under the impression that the Senate bill had passed the House carrying this same authorization.

Mr. CRAMTON. That language was stricken out by the House on a point of order. That is legislation that was inserted in the Senate. We are bringing it in under the rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood it was by a separate bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, no. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. The next is Senate amendment numbered 112, on page 117.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 112, on page 117: At the top of the page insert: "Authority is granted to purchase during the fiscal year 1923, from the appropriation made for the construction and operation of railroads in Alaska, articles and supplies for sale to employees and contractors, the appropriation to be reimbursed by the proceeds of such sales."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 113, after line 5, page 117, insert: "During the fiscal year 1923 there shall be covered into the appropriation established from time to time under the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved March 12, 1914, as amended, the proceeds of the sale of material utilized for temporary work and structures in connection with the operations under said act, as well as the sales of all other condemned property which has been purchased or constructed under the provisions thereof; also any moneys refunded in connection with the construction and operations under said act, and a report hereunder shall be made to Congress at the beginning of its next session."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 113 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "cession," in the last line of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "Provided, That the aggregate amount credited to such corporation under the authority contained in this paragraph shall not exceed $200,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the purpose of authorizing this money to be covered into a separate continuing appropriation for the fiscal year and not covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman that the language inserted by the Senate is the same language as has been carried in the bills heretofore appropriating for the Alaska Railroad under which any amount of obsolete machinery and surplus supplies could be sold and the moneys received used for new construction work. Some question was raised in the House when this bill was here on first passage, and as a result we are putting in a limitation that in any event the amount realized and used for construction work shall not exceed $200,000, to avoid any great extension of the authorized cost; and I am advised by Colonel Mears, in charge of that work, that that limitation will be entirely satisfactory to them as well.

Mr. STAFFORD. If there are sales of property exceeding $200,000, then they will be covered into the Treasury?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes. Then the money will go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the further conference asked for by the Senate and that the Speaker appoint the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House agree to the further conference asked by the Senate and that the Speaker appoint the conferees. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. CARTER.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FUNK, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for 10 days, effective April 3, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DOMINICK, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers relating to H. R. 9377, H. R. 9378, and H. R. 9379, all the Sixty-sixth Congress, no adverse reports having been made thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill 7544 and the bill 10941.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Veterans' Bureau.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on March 17 I introduced a resolution providing for appointment of a committee to investigate the Veterans' Bureau, particularly the operation of its regional offices.

The reported shortages at some of the regional offices arising from causes brought to the attention of the House in the resolution offered, together with the apparent extravagance and undoubted mismanagement and inefficiency, which is testified to almost daily by Members on the floor of this House, demand an immediate investigation.

I have requested the chairman of the Rules Committee, to which the resolution was referred, to arrange for an early hearing, but so far as I am advised no date has been fixed.

Surely there is no desire upon the part of anyone to make a political issue of a matter so vital to the interest of our ex-service men. Certainly there is no such intention upon my part, and the fact that most of the criticism—and by far the severest arraignment—of the bureau has come from the Republican side, indicates beyond question that desire to benefit the ex-service man is the one and only motive which prompts criticism.

Demonstrating inefficiency in the bureau, I bring to attention of Members two instances regarding recent developments in cases handled through my office. The first relates to claim for insurance from my home county. Briefly stated, it is as follows:

On November 4 of last year the bureau advised me that an insurance award had been made to Green Norris, whose interest I was endeavoring to protect. They advised, however, that they were unable to pay the amount of award due, inasmuch as they had no record as to whereabouts and post-office address of said Norris.

On November 7 I notified the bureau that a letter addressed to Norris, in care of G. C. Bidgood, his attorney, Dublin, Ga., would be promptly delivered. I thought remittance had been made until March 1, when I received a letter from Mr. Bidgood asking when claimant's check might be expected. I then took the matter up with the bureau and was advised just as I had been in November—that they were unable to deliver checks because they had no information as to claimant's post-office address. I again advised the bureau, by telephone and letter, that any communication addressed to Norris in care of his attorney, at Dublin, Ga., would be received, and called attention to the fact I had furnished the correct address four months prior to that date. Upon a third inquiry, made March 20, I was again advised they were without information as to Norris's proper address. I then wrote the director as follows:

MARCH 22, 1922.

Col. C. R. FORBES,
Director Veterans' Bureau, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLONEL FORBES: I have heretofore supposed that employees in the bureau, intrusted with the dictation of correspondence, answering letters written by Members of Congress concerning our ex-service men, would at least make a reasonable effort to familiarize themselves with the record in the case before undertaking to write upon important matters pertaining to it. In this, it seems, I am in error.

I call your special attention to the last paragraph of your letter dated March 20, regarding the above-stated case, and to the fact that on November 7 of last year I gave you the address of Green Norris, one of the beneficiaries. Again on March 7—just four months later—I stated I had given you the address in November and again informed you that a letter addressed to him at Dublin, Ga., care of G. C. Bidgood, his attorney, would be delivered. A few days later in telephonic conversation with Mr. Wright, of the congressional service section, I told him that the post-office address which you seemed to interpret as "Lallie," and which you said could not be found in Georgia, was Lollie, located in Laurens County, some 8 miles from Dublin, where his attorney resides. It is assumed Mr. Wright made a notation in the file to this effect, and if he did not, I am sure it was because he did not think it necessary, inasmuch as I had previously given the proper address in two different letters.

Certainly you must know that such uncalled-for errors are very annoying and that neither the public nor Congress will long continue to endure such negligence and inefficiency.

I suggest that the question as to Mr. Norris's post-office address be settled. I know it is possible to do this whether we can agree upon person to whom insurance should be paid or not.

Awaiting your reply, I am,
Sincerely yours,
W. W. LARSEN.

Officials admit receipt of my previous letters and verbal instructions, but offer no excuse as to delay and inefficiency.

Another case well representing conditions as they now exist is illustrated by decision recently made in the fifth regional district at Atlanta, Ga. I quote from a letter written me by the district manager under date of March 27, as follows:

Under date of March 7, 1922, the following award was approved in favor of the above-named claimant:

"Eight dollars monthly payment, commencing December 16, 1919, continuing during the period in which his disability, arising from defective mental development, remains temporary partial 10 per cent. The district board of appeals has found that this is no vocational handicap to a farmer. He is, therefore, not eligible for training under section 2."

The plain statement is that the district board of appeals has ruled that 10 per cent mental disability is no "vocational handicap" to a farmer.

We can not expect any man to efficiently administer the affairs of the ex-service man who does not know that 10 per cent mental disability is a serious handicap in any line of business. Certainly it is as great a handicap in farming as it would be in any other line of endeavor. It takes as much business ability to successfully operate a 10-horse farm as it does to operate the average successful business enterprise, and more than is used in the operation of a major portion of the Veterans' Bureau. It certainly takes equally as much business ability to operate such a farm as it does to successfully direct affairs of the average country bank.

I have long realized the regard which certain gentlemen, not all of them housed in the Veterans' Bureau, have for the farmer. For their benefit I desire to take advantage of this opportunity to say that the purest, most unselfish, and patriotic blood of this country has always come from the farm. It has at all times guided the destiny of the Nation and has successfully met every emergency that has confronted it. If we take from this Nation the native business ability, the patriotic impulse, the virtue and Christian spirit, developed and nurtured upon our farms, it will at once degenerate and decay.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in reference to the conference report on the bill that we had up to-day relating to the Shipping Board.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

FIFTH STATE LEGISLATURE, STATE OF ARIZONA,
First Special Session.

Senate joint memorial 1.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the fifth State Legislature of the State of Arizona, in special session assembled, respectfully represent:

Whereas under the act of Congress of August 24, 1921, entitled "An act to amend the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, to provide relief for producers of and dealers in agricultural products, and for other purposes," it is provided that advances may be made until July 1, 1922; and

Whereas the cattle interests of Arizona have suffered during the past few years in a manner whereby acceptance of the provisions of the said act of Congress offers material aid and relief; and

Whereas the singular climatic conditions existing throughout the State of Arizona make it impossible to round up and count cattle in the winter months, and of delay in forming companies to receive applications, will prevent many worthy producers from obtaining much needed relief by being unable to make formal application on or before July 1, 1922, the final date fixed by the said act of Congress for receiving applications: It is therefore

Resolved by the Fifth Legislature of the State of Arizona, in special session assembled, acting upon petition of the Arizona Cattle Growers' Association, praying for aid and relief, That Congress be memorialized to grant to the said War Finance Corporation full powers to extend the time set until July 1, 1923, as vital to the life and interests of many of the cattle raisers of the State of Arizona: It is further

Resolved, That suitably engrossed copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, the Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST, the Hon. RALPH CAMERON, United States Senators for Arizona, Hon. CARL HAYDEN, Member of Congress for Arizona, praying them to do their utmost to secure, in the interests of the cattlemen of Arizona, the extension of time so vital to their several and joint interests, and a copy to the chairman of the War Finance Corporation, Washington, D. C.

Adopted by unanimous vote of senate, March 2, 1922.

H. B. WILKINSON,
President of the Senate.

Mr. DIAL. My colleague [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained. I ask that this announcement may continue through the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. STANFIELD] on public business. I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Idaho.

THE COAL MINERS' STRIKE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are again in the midst of a coal catastrophe. It is perhaps too early to discuss the subject matter in its entirety, because it is too large a subject to master in any reasonable length of time, and particularly the intricacies of the present situation. But there is one feature of the situation which I think ought to be accentuated, and the importance of which can not be overestimated, and that is the question of the contractual relations between the operators and the miners.

I regard the situation as a very serious one for many reasons. It would be serious under any circumstances and under any conditions in the country, because the public is largely at the mercy of this industry; it can not live and thrive without the industry; but it is particularly serious at this time. It is said there are from 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 men out of employment in the country, generally speaking; that is to say, aside from this industry. Now to throw out of employment some 500,000 or 600,000 men in addition to the already idle men makes the situation an exceedingly serious one. It is a crisis, industrially speaking.

The contract under which the miners were working up until the 1st day of April of this year, last Saturday, had in it the following clause:

Resolved, That an interstate joint conference be held prior to April 1, 1922. The time and place for holding said meeting is referred to a committee of two operators and two members from each State herein represented, together with the international officers of the United Mine Workers of America.

This was a part of the contract which had been made a long time previously and under which they had been working for many months. This particular clause of the contract had in no sense been abrogated, modified, or changed. It was binding upon the parties until the 31st day of March, 1922. So we have, Mr. President, the extraordinary situation that those who control this great industry either can not or will not perform the solemn obligations of their contract.

I am perfectly aware that there has been some contention to the effect that the contract had been abrogated or disregarded by the miners themselves. I think there have been some changes in the contract from its original terms, but it is not necessary to discuss those changes, for the reason that, whatever misunderstandings may have occurred or whatever changes may have taken place, the contract was regarded as still binding and still obligatory. The miners continued to work under the contract and the mine operators continued to regard the contract as binding. So whatever disputes had arisen or whatever infringement or modification had taken place, they were not deemed to have abrogated the contract. We find, therefore, that the contract is a binding obligation though wholly disregarded in this respect by the mine operators.

Mr. President, there is another feature of this question. Suppose there had been no contract; suppose that the contract, in other words, had been wholly abrogated, and was in no sense binding upon the operators, still the highest obligation rested upon them to secure a conference or to avail themselves of the benefits of a conference with the miners. The industry, Mr. President, the mine owners, owed something to the public; they owed it to the public to use their utmost efforts to bring about an understanding between themselves and the miners. If the miners had refused to confer, the criticism would have been upon them; but neither the miners nor the mine owners, neither the operators nor the workers, can, in view of the interest which the public has in this matter, afford for a moment to take the position that, contract or no contract, they will decline, disregard, or refuse an opportunity for a conference in regard to the future working of the mines. So, it is immaterial, in my opinion, in the larger aspect of the case, as to whether the contract was technically binding or not. However, for fear that I should be misunderstood, I will say that, in my opinion, it was technically binding.

We have reached a point with reference to this industry where the contractual relation between the mine owners and the operatives seems to have broken down; and nothing could be more serious to the country than such a situation. If it comes to be understood that the mine owners and the miners can no longer enjoy the benefit of a conference by the results of which they shall both be bound and which in good faith they will carry out, we have reached the point where the public, in its own defense, must take some drastic measures in order to control the industry. That, to my mind, is the most important feature of the controversy as it is now presented to us.

There has not been, Mr. President, very much dispute upon the part of the operators as to the fact that they have violated their contract. Some have offered one excuse and some another, some have offered one justification and some another; but that the contract was binding upon them and that they have disregarded it is practically conceded upon the part of those who control this great industry. For instance, the statement of Mr. Penna, who is at the head of the Indiana Coal Operators' Association, according to the public print, is as follows:

> I do not think the operators of the central competitive field will meet the miners to make a new agreement before April 1.

Mr. President, if the mine owners refuse to meet with the miners to deal with the question of wages, it is perfectly apparent that one of two things must follow: Either a strike is inevitable and the miners cease to work, or the miners go back to work for wages absolutely dictated by the mine owners themselves. If there can not be consideration of and regard for each other's rights through the medium of a conference, then it is perfectly apparent that they must pull apart entirely or one surrender absolutely to the other.

That is a condition in this great industry, Mr. President, to which the American people will not submit. In my judgment they will neither permit the men who work in the mines to control the industry, nor the men who own the mines to dictate the terms upon which the men who work in the mines shall labor.

The third party in this controversy is the one who is always lost sight of, and that is the public. It does not make any difference what the circumstances are or the causes which give rise to the conflict, nor how long the conflict is carried on, nor the amount of loss that ensues, the third party, the public, is the party which must in the end bear the brunt of the loss, because it will finally be passed up to the public either by an increased price of coal or in other ways.

I should read further, however, from Mr. Penna's statement, because I have read only a part of it, and I do not desire to do Mr. Penna or anyone else any injustice by stating only a portion of his position. Mr. Penna proceeds:

> I can not answer for Pennsylvania and Southern Ohio, unless it is that the miners' demands are so impossible that the operators of those districts regard it a waste of time and money to meet to discuss them. All operators share this opinion, especially in view of the fact that we were in almost six months' continuous conference in 1920—discussing the same absurdities, practically all of which were denied by the Federal Commission.
> There is no reply to the mine workers' charge—that the operators have violated the agreement in refusing to meet them except to admit the fact, and the only excuse is that a contract with the United Mine Workers is of no value. Under the present contract we have had more than 200 strikes in Indiana, each of which is admitted by the miners' officers a violation of the contract by the miners.

Whether the fault be here or there, with the miners or the mine operators, it appears that they have lost confidence in each other, are unwilling to meet, are unwilling to contract, and when a contract is made they regard it as wholly worthless. If that comes to be the settled policy with reference to this great industry, then it devolves upon the Congress of the United States and the Government, and particularly the party in power, to find a remedy which will protect the public interest. It is simply inconceivable that the industry can continue to serve the public if contractual relations between the two factors, those who own the mines and those who work them, have broken down.

I am perfectly aware, Mr. President, that the public will hesitate a great while before adopting the drastic measure of public ownership; and there are many things which may be done this side of public ownership in the way of regulation which might effectuate a cure; but, whether it be by drastic regulation and control or by public ownership, the mine operators of this country ought to understand that they are inviting the public to take that step by refusing to comply with the solemn obligations of their contract in assisting to find a solution of the difficulty.

It has been said, Mr. President, in the public prints that the Government at this time finds itself helpless and powerless to remedy the situation. It may be that, owing to the law as it now stands and the situation as we find it, the Government is in a sense helpless, but certainly the Government is not going to remain helpless; certainly we are not going to consent to a recurring catastrophe, which happens about once a year, all of the expense of which is finally borne by the public. We are not going to continue to consent to such a condition of affairs.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the investigation which was made not long since of the conditions in the West Virginia coal fields, in connection with which a report was submitted, as I remember, by Senator Kenyon, would be helpful in the present situation? Did that investigation develop any facts or reach any conclusions which would tend to solve the present problem of which the Senator is speaking?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that it threw very much light upon the situation. Of course, beyond the question which I am discussing to-day is the controverted field involving the question of profits and the question of wages, both of which will at the proper time come up for legislative consideration and discussion.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Have we not provided by law a board of arbitration to act in the case of such controversies as that at present existing? My impression is that we created such a board some years ago, I think at the instance of Senator Newlands, who was very much interested in the legislation.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, I think the Senator from Minnesota must refer to the Board of Mediation and Conciliation.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; that is what I had in mind—the Board of Mediation and Conciliation.

Mr. STERLING. The question is whether such a board would have jurisdiction over the subject which the Senator from Idaho is now discussing. As I understand—and I have just come into the Chamber—the Senator from Idaho is referring to the coal situation.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. Of course, the Board of Mediation and Conciliation has primarily to do with interstate commerce and disputes between employers and employees engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the Senator from South Dakota is correct in his construction of the law.

I am not assuming to-day to place the responsibility for the exorbitant and outrageous price which we have to pay for coal, nor to dissect and analyze the entire coal situation. Undoubtedly, when we arrive at an analysis of the entire situation there will be justification for difference of view, but I do want to say that the mine operators of this country, the mine owners, must take responsibility for the situation as it exists up to this time when they refuse to carry out their contract to confer with the men, who are willing and ready to confer with them. A conference might not result in a solution, but certainly, until the first step is taken and a conference is had and good faith is disclosed, there is no possibility of a reconciliation, and the refusal to take that step, it seems to me, lies at the door of the operators and not at the door of the miners.

APPOINTMENTS TO AND REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. CARAWAY and Mr. OVERMAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] had the floor yesterday evening at the time the Senate recessed, and he agreed to yield to me.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator desire to consume much time?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not care to occupy much of the time of the Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me yield to the Senator, then, and I will take the floor later.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] was recognized this morning, and yielded the floor to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is correct, Mr. President. If I am recognized now, I am willing to yield to either of these Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. The point of order is that the Senator from Florida is not entitled to the floor at the present time. He yielded it to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. OVERMAN. I had forgotten that.

Mr. NORRIS. If he had the floor then, he lost it by that yielding.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Arkansas having been recognized, he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have an amendment pending to the bill, and I want to get to it as soon as I can. I am perfectly willing to accommodate other Senators, and I am not claiming any rights.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the judicial bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not know that the Senator from Arkansas desired to address himself to that amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will say to the Senator that I shall be through in a few minutes.

Mr. President, yesterday I had nearly concluded some remarks I was desirous of making touching the Executive order that the President issued Friday, discharging from the public service the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and 31 chiefs of bureaus of that institution, when the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] felt compelled to protect the record of the administration by taking me off the floor. I am conscious of the unpleasant situation, and I have, therefore, nothing but sympathy for the Senator from Illinois, who wanted, as far as he could, to shut off discussion of this extraordinary order of the President.

Men with services ranging all the way from 20 to 39 years, services that had been acceptable to both Republican and Democratic administrations, men against whom no charge has ever been made, either of inefficiency or of dishonor, were removed from their positions and discharged from the public service by an Executive order. I venture the assertion that no President in the history of this country since civil service has become the law of this Nation ever dared so autocratically to disregard the law and disregard the rights of human beings as did the President by this Executive order.

The law is plain. It required the President—and he is not above the law—to follow a certain procedure under which these men could at least have protected their reputation by denials. The President ignored that. He ignored this law with the Attorney General in conference with him. Therefore there is no reason, if there was any knowledge of the law in the Attorney General's office, why the President should have run roughshod over the rights of these men and wholly disregarded the law of the land.

I think the gravest hurt is to the public morale. When men and women lose confidence in the justice of their Government and in the men who are charged temporarily with the administration of law, they have been done a great injury. I do not care how a man may apologize in his heart for the administration; he may assert that the President was within his rights; but I say that there is no man with any human kindness in his heart who can read that order and not know that it was an inhuman order, and no man with any knowledge of the law of his land can read it and not know that it was a violation of the law by the President when he issued it.

The first play, I think, that I ever witnessed was Blanche Bates in The Darling of the Gods. One line in that play has stayed with me all these years. She was caught in a rather compromising position, and by misrepresenting the facts escaped, and with a cynical smile said: "It is better to lie a little than to be unhappy much." But death came, and she was denied admission into Paradise; and then, turning, she said: "There is a little word called 'honor,' and I had it not, and for that reason I am condemned for a thousand years to wander in outer darkness."

There is a little word called "honor." It is as binding upon the President of these United States as upon the humblest citizen of this land; and it is all the more regrettable when the President shall forget it and deny justice to men upon whom he has the power to inflict an irremediable injury.

Here are men who have been destroyed, their reputations of a lifetime swept away, by an Executive order, and, forsooth, the President says that he has no explanation to make. Later on he may find some reason that he hopes the public will accept; but I think the President does the public a grave injustice. They are not going to accept a reason that it takes the Executive days and days, with all the machinery and all the agencies and all the ingenuity of the administration at his back, to conjure up to offer to the public for this drastic and unjust order that he issued on Friday.

He attempts now to do, by having his secretary write a private letter to one of these injured parties, what he ought to do publicly. These men who have been summarily dismissed, with an appointment, as I understand, called on the President, but the President, of course, was compelled to be away—to play golf, perhaps; and what is the call of justice, and why should he refrain from his amusements that men and women might have justice done to them and to their reputations? So he was absent, and the secretary of the President writes this letter to one of them. It is dated April 3, 1922:

THE WHITE HOUSE, Washington.

MY DEAR MR. DEVINY: I have shown to the President the statement left by you and your associates on the occasion of your call at the White House this afternoon. He asks me to make reply and say that he would have been very glad to meet your delegation had he been present at the time of your call—

But, of course, he saw fit not to be present—

Though he is not yet prepared to make his statement relative to his Executive order which was made effective on Friday evening, March 31.

Not yet prepared to tell why he destroyed the reputations of these men, and denied them a right to make an honest living—not yet prepared!

The President has had no wish to reflect upon the character of any Government employee, but he did hold that a sweeping change in the bureau was essential for the good of the service. He regrets the insinuating publicity no less than those do who have been discontinued from the public service.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE B. CHRISTIAN, Jr.,
Secretary to the President.

Oh, well, Mr. President, it is a great thing to be President of these United States and hold more or less in the hollow of your hand the destiny of a hundred and ten millions of people; but, if I may be permitted to say so, it is a despicable thing to do a great injury to a number of them, or to one of them for that matter, and then decline to say to them privately or to say to the public why he did it. He knows; he must know; and, therefore, to deny them the right to be told of the offense, if any they have committed, that justified him in destroying their reputations that they have been a lifetime in building is inexcusable; and there is a stronger word that I would use if it were not for the proprieties of the occasion. It is regrettable! It is going to bring the blush of shame to every man and woman that voted to make him President of these United States. I do not care what they may say by way of apology; they are bound to feel humiliated by this act of his.

Mr. Hill, who profited by this order, I never saw, and I am frank to say I hope I never shall. He belongs to that class of people about whom I have known all that I want to know—men who seek their own ends, who are satisfied if they triumph, even if everyone else perishes. He gave out an interview day before yesterday in which he said that "of course the Democratic Senators were going to howl when good Republicans get jobs." That satisfied him day before yesterday. Yesterday afternoon he rushed into print again. He loves to talk.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator reads that would he mind a slight interruption?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield to the Senator, with pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose Mr. Hill had stood upon what he said, and suppose the President had said frankly that they wanted to turn out a certain lot of Democrats and put in a certain lot of Republicans; then that would not have hurt the reputations of the people who were removed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; it would have been to their credit that they were Democrats.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And a good many of us not very much in love with the civil service might have thought that probably in the same fix we might have done the same thing. In that connection, did the Senator from Arkansas ever read "Martin Chuzzlewit"? I suppose he has.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator remembers the death scene of old Martin, when they were all gathered around waiting for what they could get, and Pecksniff, in his characteristic and inimitable way, made a speech, and old Anthony interrupted him after a while—Anthony was a plain, blunt old scoundrel—and said: "Pecksniff, Pecksniff, let's not have any hypocrisy." Does the Senator recall that scene?

Mr. CARAWAY. I recall that; but to do that you would have to abolish this administration.

Mr. President, I started to read some of Hill's interview; and, incidentally, I hope that everybody who would like to know Mr. Hill will observe his picture. When he had succeeded to the desk of a man whose disgrace, as I now understand, he helped to bring about, his first official act was to have his picture taken with a smile that spread from ear to ear and disclosed every false tooth in his head.

Mr. Hill says:

I understand there will be further lay offs in other branches of the Treasury Department than this, which will divert public attention from us.

In other words, in order to cover up this wrong and divert the public attention the administration has in contemplation other outrages upon the civil service. Other men and other women are to have their reputations destroyed so that the public may forget the incident by which Hill and his crowd crawled into place last Friday.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, this story, "Harding to explain."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of Monday, April 3, 1922.]

HARDING TO EXPLAIN—TO CLEAR UP MYSTERY OF UNWARNED DISMISSALS AT ENGRAVING BUREAU—SENATOR CARAWAY OFFERS RESOLUTION DEMANDING EXPLANATION—JUSTICE DEPARTMENT AGENTS SCRUTINIZED PLANT, HILL SAYS—OTHER DISCHARGES COMING.

It was intimated by Department of Justice officials that a White House statement within a week would clear up the mystery which still surrounds the dismissal without warning of 28 employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Director Hill, of the bureau, said the fact the Department of Justice had admitted an investigation had been going forward and that there was an additional probe of the bureau now under way in connection with an inventory of stock, should indicate to the public the reason for the President's summary action.

The United States Secret Service Department denied knowledge of wrongdoing at the bureau. It was suggested at the Capitol to-day that the President's going over the head of William Moran, Chief of the Secret Service, and calling on William J. Burns's agents indicated changes due in the Secret Service and favorable consideration by the President of the proposal to combine all investigating agencies of all departments under Burns.

ASKS PRESIDENT TO EXPLAIN.

Senator CARAWAY, of Arkansas, to-day introduced the following resolution:

"Where as without notice, as required by law, and without warning the President of the United States, under an Executive order issued Friday, March 31, 1922, dismissed James L. Wilmeth, Director of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, and 31 other chiefs and assistant chiefs of divisions of that bureau; and

"Whereas all of said persons were in the classified service; and

"Whereas the law permits the dismissal of persons within the classified service only after written notice and an opportunity to reply to such charge should be given the accused: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to report to the Senate, if it be not incompatible with the public good, (a) what facts warranted the dismissal of the men mentioned from the classified service, (b) on what authority and by what authority he dismissed these employees from the service in the manner followed."

Senator CARAWAY pointed out the case of E. H. Ashworth, which he considered as one of particular injustice.

A similar resolution was introduced in the House by Representative MOORE of Virginia, except that MOORE proposed the appointment of a House committee to ascertain the facts. He suggested that the known attitude of Attorney General Daugherty toward the civil service incapacitates his office for a proper investigation.

COMMENDED AT 4 P. M.; FIRED AT 6.45.

"Mr. Ashworth was for over 28 years custodian of dies, rolls, and plates. On January 3 a committee from the Treasury Department was appointed to check over his work and supplies.

"This committee reported on Friday at 4 p. m. that Mr. Ashworth's work was found in splendid shape and commended him for his business methods and faithful service.

"At 6.45 he was dismissed from the service by the Executive order of President Harding without notice."

NO POLITICS, HILL DECLARES.

Politics had nothing to do with the changes made in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Louis A. Hill, new director, said to-day.

"I have been 21 years a workman here. I came in as a workman and know nothing of politics. Not a man advanced is a politician. They are all technical men promoted on merit. As many Republicans as Democrats were put out, and I imagine as many Democrats as Republicans have been promoted. I don't know the politics of the men, but selected them to speed up production," he said.

"The bureau can not have political appointees in it. The work is too technical," he added. "My predecessor, James L. Wilmeth, is the only nontechnical man who has been connected with the work here."

OTHER LAY OFFS WILL DIVERT ATTENTION.

"The change was for efficiency. The fact that Saturday was the biggest production day the plant has had in months proves the wisdom of the change and the smoothness with which it was made."

Questioned as to hints at wrongdoing, Hill said merely that the special agents of the Department of Justice, under direction of William J. Burns, were making an inventory of the plant for him.

"I asked the inventory as a business man taking over a big business. What the agents will find I am not at liberty to say. I believe that the President's action in making the drastic change was founded on facts discovered in a special Department of Justice scrutiny of the plant. Those facts I can't talk of now. Mr. Burns's office or the President are the ones to issue statements.

"I understand there will be further lay offs in other branches of the Treasury Department than this, which will divert public attention from us," he concluded.

Hill does not believe civil service laws were violated. He said the men were likely removed for cause, "for the good of the service," and that was legal under civil-service regulations.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is still another story, more remarkable. It appears under the headline "White House ax soon to fall on Treasury Department."

It was published yesterday afternoon in the Times—and let me say, while comparisons are invidious, and sometimes odious, the Times at least has had independence. I mean, it has had entire independence. It is not like one other paper published in the District of Columbia, which always finds that the President is right about what he has done, and will be right whatever he may do. The Times has this story:

BLOW DUE IN INCOME-TAX UNIT—THREESCORE OFFICIALS ON LIST—E. H. BATSON AND MAPES INCLUDED.

The end of the scrapping of unsympathetic bureau organizations by the White House is not yet.

Threescore officials of high and low degree in the income-tax section of the Treasury Department were getting ready to-day to look for new jobs.

President Harding has called for a list of the deputy commissioners and division heads in the Income Tax Bureau and others with a view to removing those who do not qualify as "Harding Republicans."

God bless his soul, if he turns out everybody who in his heart is not a Harding Republican there will not be enough men to act as custodians for the building. The article continues:

E. H. BATSON ON LIST.

E. H. Batson, Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in charge of the income-tax unit, will be one of the first to go. He will be succeeded by E. W. Chatterton, assistant in that unit, it was stated to-day by those in close touch with the movement of the Harding resurfacing machine—

Whatever that particular kind of a machine may be.

Chatterton was formerly a clerk in the Post Office Department, but was taken to the Income Tax Bureau when Dan E. Roper was promoted from First Assistant Postmaster General to Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

On the same list of those slated for discharge is Carl A. Mapes, solicitor of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Mapes was appointed by President Harding a few days after the inauguration. It was a hurry-up appointment, it is said, that has never met with general approval by party leaders—

Whoever they are.

It was learned to-day that President Harding has already tentatively agreed on a prominent Ohio Republican to succeed Mapes.

I would like to know, Mr. President, how many prominent Republicans there are in Ohio. If they have not all been given jobs—I am talking about the Republicans—there is some mistake in the census enumeration of the Republican population of that State.

Mr. POMERENE. There were a great many more of them in 1920 than there ever will be again.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, and there are a great many of them now who would insult you if you accused them of having voted that way in 1920, and I would not blame them; a man has a right to protect his reputation. This article continues:

The income-tax unit has given the White House great concern, it is said, because so many division heads and subordinates there have failed to give the Harding administration the "party support" that was expected. In fact, some of them are said to be so lukewarm in support of the President's policies as to be classed as "friends of the Democratic Party."

Mr. President, without taking up the time of the Senate to read the entire article, I shall make it a part of my remarks if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

WHITE HOUSE HAS NAMES.

Some time ago steps were taken to reorganize the income-tax unit, and the names of several officers who could not be regarded as "Harding Republicans" were sent to the White House.

A high official of the Treasury Department, in close touch with the administration, declared to-day that Internal Revenue Commissioner Blair would not be dropped. It was further stated that the administration felt that with sympathetic officials in charge the task of cleaning up back work would be speeded up in a way that would reflect great credit on the administration and make good the preelection promises of the party of a business policy.

Nine heads in the income-tax unit are being carefully checked up and dismissal or transfer faces each. In some cases, it is said, their present assistants will succeed them. In three or more divisions there will be a clean sweep, both the division head and his assistant being slated for removal.

THOSE NOW ON THE LIST.

The nine division heads are: B. E. Hunsinger, staff division; C. B. Allen, administrative division; B. S. Kimbrell, personal audit division; F. R. Clute, corporation audit division; C. M. Justice, field division; S. Alexander, special audit division; A. H. Fay, natural resources division; W. R. Campbell, review division; and Edward White, statistical division.

The assistants who are being considered for either dismissal or promotion are: F. M. Woodward, administrative division; Oliver Kinsel, corporation audit division; J. L. McGrew, field division; P. F. Cain, special audit division; H. L. Sincoe, natural resources division; F. A. Urice, review division; and J. T. Jamison, statistical division.

The nine division heads constitute what is known as the executive committee, with Deputy Batson as chairman. It was pointed out to-day that should the deputy and a majority of the members of the executive committee be out of harmony with the policies of the administration their rulings would completely demoralize the work of the unit.

Under the direct supervision of the nine division chiefs are two subordinates, who, in turn, direct a staff. A dozen of these subchiefs, it is said, are slated for removal.

"There is no cause for alarm," said a leading Harding Republican to-day. "To get the best results and to give the country a thoroughgoing business administration it is necessary to have officials all along the line who will work in harmony and keep an eye on the wishes of the Chief Executive.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is all interesting, and I rather think every word of it is true. If I may be permitted to go back to the statement of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], I have not been so unalterably wedded to the civil service. I do believe, however, that the administration ought to have the courage to disclaim any reasons other than politics for thus demoting and degrading and dismissing from the service these men and women. If it feels that it is in such a precarious condition, and that its conduct of public affairs has so absolutely fallen down, that if the public should find it out it would be itself retired at the first opportunity, so that it wants to surround itself by people who will keep secret its failures to properly administer public affairs, it ought to be permitted to do it. However, as I have said, every Republican Member of both the House and Senate ought to demand that the administration shall have the courage to say, "We are removing these men and women simply because they are not of the political faith of this administration; we have secrets which we do not want the public to learn, and we are afraid to have near us honest people who are not partisans. Therefore we want to discharge them all and surround ourselves with people who will swear we are right whether we be right or wrong." If they will do that, I shall not complain much. I rather imagine the American people, however, will complain very bitterly.

Here is another article; a most remarkable one. It has appeared twice, and the administration has not denied it. It is headed, "Why Wilmeth was fired—Clean-up in Treasury outcome of charges filed with Congress." I want to read this, because it affects the honor of at least one Member of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In what paper does that appear?

Mr. CARAWAY. This is in the Times.

Mr. STANLEY. What is the issue?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yesterday afternoon's issue. It reads:

Mystery surrounding the discharge of James Wilmeth, Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and several other employees by Executive order was partly cleared up to-day when it was learned a large number of charges, supported by affidavits, involving the director and many employees of the bureau had been in the hands of the Department of Justice and Members of Congress for several months.

As I said, Mr. President, this affects vitally the honor of one Member of the Senate, and I want to call it to the attention of the Senate, because the Senator reflected upon may know. I do not know who he is. It is said:

ACTION PROMPTED BY THREATS.

A demand for immediate action, under threat of newspaper exposé, caused the precipitate action of the administration. This situation tends to disprove thoroughly the charges of "playing politics" made against the administration.

Accusations involving the director of the bureau and certain other employees, it was learned to-day, were filed with the Department of Justice and with members of the House Committee on Finance more than a year ago.

I presume it evidently meant the House Committee on Ways and Means. The article continues:

No apparent action was taken by the Department of Justice.

Members of Congress, seeking to eliminate the abuses charged, it is understood, met with insurmountable obstacles in obtaining official action or official cooperation.

Late in December, 1921, or early in January, 1922, employees of the bureau and public-spirited citizens interested in the case filed further supporting affidavits with the Treasury Department, the Department of Justice, and Members of Congress.

As a result of this action the Treasury Department ordered an investigation of the bureau. This inquiry, which was conducted in secret, was made, it is charged, by persons who had long been associated with Director Wilmeth in his work as chief clerk of the Treasury Department.

Apparently no action was taken as the result of the investigation, and it was assumed the bureau was given a clean bill by the investigating committee.

SECOND INVESTIGATION.

Shortly after this, additional affidavits supporting the charges against the bureau management were filed with the Treasury Department, Department of Justice, and Members of Congress.

At this time, it is learned, the charges reached the ears of the President.

President Harding immediately ordered the Secretary of the Treasury to conduct a thorough inquiry into the charges.

Comptroller of the Currency D. R. Crissinger—was directed by Secretary Mellon to make a personal investigation.

That is another Ohioan—

Again there was no apparent action resulting from the inquiry. Director Wilmeth continued in office. However, intimations were made that a considerable number of employees were to be discharged by the director. Employees who were concerned in the charges against Director Wilmeth state that most of their number were to be included in the proposed dismissals.

The threatened discharge of these employees, it is believed, led to the summary action forced upon the administration in the dismissal of the director and many of his assistants.

Here is the story:

SUMMARY ACTION TAKEN.

Last Thursday employees of the bureau and others who have made charges against the director visited Comptroller Crissinger and members of the Finance Committee of the House and at least one Member of the Senate.

They stated that unless Director Wilmeth and certain other employees of the bureau were discharged at once, galley proofs of the charges with a detailed account of alleged abuses at the bureau would be immediately released for publication.

Treasury officials asked for one week's delay.

This was refused, and 24 hours was given for action, with a threat of immediate publication in case no action was taken.

STORY IN TYPE.

The galley proofs shown to Members of Congress and to the Treasury officials are said to have contained accusations of such astounding nature as to cause Treasury officials to fear for the reputation, not only of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing but of the Treasury Department, and even the entire financial fabric of the Government.

Intimations are made, it is understood, concerning the duplication of Government securities of large denominations.

It is charged that during the war large numbers of Liberty bonds were printed in duplicate, and that these bonds, or coupons therefrom, are being received at the Treasury Department every day, and are being redeemed without question.

Treasury officials fear, it is said, the effect that would be produced through widespread publication of charges of duplicated bonds—that is, securities without compensating reserves.

It is believed that is the reason action has not been taken previously on the charges brought against the bureau.

I do not know whether it is true or not. I am frank to say it sounds to me to be unreasonable, but here is the charge, made in a reputable newspaper published in the Capital City, that irregularities, which of course amounted to forgeries and frauds, had been committed by employees in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and that the knowledge of the felonious acts had been brought to the attention of Members of the House, to the attention of at least one Member of the Senate, and laid before the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General, and employees in that office; but, in order to hush up this story, they permitted these people who had a knowledge of the facts to drive out of office the men who held the places, and presumably to take the places themselves. That would be a compounding of a felony, and every man who assented to it, every man who for any reason at all agreed that he would keep secret these acts of this administration, in order to get a place himself, or in order to protect the administration from criticism, himself would have committed a crime. It is such a vicious charge that I say I do not lend credence to it; but at least it has found its way into the public print, and some Member of the Senate, if he was actually approached and does have information of this, and some Members of the House, if the story is correct; the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General of the United States, at least, are technically guilty of a felonious crime if this statement is true.

Therefore, in order to prove that it is not true, at the conclusion of my remarks I shall introduce a resolution of investigation. I know that no Senator can afford to object to its immediate consideration, because no man can afford himself to be suspected as being the one who had this information and agreed to hush it up. No man who is a friend of this administration, and no man who is a lover of his country, can afford to let a story which would involve the honor and integrity of the highest officials in this land go unanswered, and the only way to hush it up is to show there is no truth in it, and the way to do that will be to grant this request for an immediate investigation of the entire matter, so that everything pertaining to the removal of these people from office, and the foundation of this story, may be known. The honor of the administration, the honor of the Senate, the honor of the House, are all involved, and the confidence of the American people in the integrity of their Government could not and should not be shaken. Therefore I say that I am sure no Senator will object to an investigation. I can not conceive of anyone doing it.

Mr. President, I have another newspaper story, which comes from "the organ," and it would be highly offensive to the administration to question anything which appears in this paper, and I would not do it. I know that it is either what the President said or what the President is going to say. It will make no difference which said it first, the other will adopt it. If the Post happens to get ahead of the President and declares what the President intends to do, the President will back up the Post and do it, or if the President does a thing the Post will say that is the thing the President ought to do. I am not criticizing the Post; I am just talking about it.

Anyway the article in the Post reads:

Bureau order clear. Leaders see no reason for Harding to explain terms.

I do not know who the leaders are. It is always such a handy thing, do not you know, when you want to back up a thing to say, "The leaders." Anybody is the "leader" who happens to be on the side doing the thing that the Post wants done.

Leaders see no reason for Harding to explain terms.

That means that the President has no intention of doing it, because, with all due deference to the President, I know that after the Post has said he was not going to do it he will not do it. He never has changed his mind when it comes to backing up the Post, although he has been rather inclined to change his mind about other things and even go away to Florida in order to keep from being harassed by the leaders when they were trying to settle whether the soldiers should be given a real bonus or be handed a gold brick. The decision was finally made in favor of the gold brick, and the President came back.

The article continues:

Disloyalty rampant in all departments, Senator asserts.

I do not know what Senator that is—oh, yes; I do. That was the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD].

Declares some hold-overs are reporting more frequently to Tumulty than to administration.

I do not know why an employee should report to either. It might be that if he did it would be a cause for removal, because he does not owe his allegiance to the administration nor does he owe it to Mr. Tumulty. He owes it to the American people, whose dollars pay his salary and whose Government he serves.

The article says:

Impatient Republicans in Congress—

And God knows they have a right to be impatient. The country is impatient with them.

Impatient Republicans in Congress and disgruntled Democrats who are insisting that the President disclose the reason for the Executive order issued on Friday making sweeping changes in the personnel of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing are not likely to get a great deal of information from the Chief Executive, it is said.

Oh, well, I presume I am a disgruntled Democrat, but if any Democrat is disgruntled with the political situation now he is an awfully hard man to please, if "disgruntled" means we are dissatisfied with the political outlook. I think it might be said that every Democrat and every self-respecting citizen of the American Republic is disgruntled with the administration. I know that every justice-loving man and woman everywhere is "disgruntled" with the Executive order which the President issued last Friday, and for which he has not been able to find a reason that would justify him in the minds of the American people, and therefore he declines to give any.

Mr. President, I shall not delay the Senate by reading all of this article, but if I may I will include it in my remarks. It appears in the Washington Post of April 4, 1922, under the head of "Bureau order clear."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

BUREAU ORDER CLEAR—LEADERS SEE NO REASON FOR HARDING TO EXPLAIN TERMS—CHARGES MADE BY HARRELD—DISLOYALTY RAMPANT IN ALL DEPARTMENTS, SENATOR ASSERTS—DECLARES SOME HOLDOVERS ARE REPORTING MORE FREQUENTLY TO TUMULTY THAN ADMINISTRATION—DEMOCRATS STIRRING UP POLITICAL ROW, OTHERS ASSERT—CARAWAY INTRODUCES RESOLUTION.

[By Harry N. Price. Copyright, 1922, by the Washington Post Co.]

Impatient Republicans in Congress and disgruntled Democrats who are insisting that the President disclose the reasons for the Executive order issued on Friday making sweeping changes in the personnel of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing are not likely to get a great deal of information from the Chief Executive, it is said. The President, according to administration officers, knew when he issued the order the consternation that would result. It has been repeatedly said there was no politics involved.

If a few Republicans are doubtful of the President's reasons for the order, it is because they have little faith in their chief, or because they may desire to embarrass him. As for the Democrats, it is only natural, Republican leaders say, that they should attempt to kick up a political row for their own benefit. During the Democratic administration, Republicans say, the Democrats were not so keen about the observance of civil service rules and regulations, but now that they are out they are insisting that Democrats under civil service must be retained, even if they are inefficient. As one Republican put it yesterday: "Why can not the Democrats be game?"

ORDER BASED ON KNOWLEDGE.

President Harding, as has been said, had full knowledge of conditions in the Bureau of Engraving before he issued his Executive order. To give to Members of Congress, Republicans or Democrats, the details of the reasons for his order at this stage of the inquiry, other than what he stated in the order, that it was "for the good of the service," obviously would interfere in all probability with the inquiry.

It has been common gossip for months that under the Democratic administration there was built up in the Treasury a Democratic machine which controlled the most important positions. Many of the men still retain their positions. Senator Harreld, of Oklahoma, commenting upon the conditions yesterday, said:

"Disloyalty is rampant in the departments of the Government in Washington. It is not confined solely to any one department. We have found that a great many of the men who hold positions because of their support of previous administrations have lately reported more frequently to Joseph P. Tumulty (former President Wilson's secretary) than to the Harding administration."

CHARGE DEMOCRATIC CONTROL.

Secretary Tumulty and Mr. McAdoo are the closest personal and political associates, and it is openly charged by Republicans in Congress that they still retain control of some of the most important Government departments through their appointees.

An instance is cited where Mr. McAdoo recently appeared as counsel in a Shipping Board case and was successful where Republicans had failed. He is said to have secured for his services, involving only one day's work, a fee of $10,000.

It is further charged that retention of McAdoo appointees in bureaus of the Treasury Department has resulted in delays of years in auditing income tax returns because of the obstructive methods of the Democrats.

Mr. CARAWAY. Now, I am being entirely fair with everybody, so I have asked to publish what the friends of the administration say and what those who do not agree with the administration say, but the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] is so clear and convincing in his statement and so candid that I want to single him out for particular honor. I want to read a part of his interview:

Disloyalty is rampant in the departments of the Government in Washington. It is not confined solely to any one department. We have found that a great many of the men who hold positions because of their support of previous administrations have lately reported more frequently to Joseph P. Tumulty (former President Wilson's secretary) than to the Harding administration.

And, therefore, in the mind of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, the reputation of a lifetime, a character for honesty and uprightness, a wife and children who love the employee, are not to be considered or taken into consideration because he has been disloyal to the Harding administration. Brush it all aside, damn them now and hereafter, and let their children and their children's children who come after them live under the stigma and disgrace in order to put somebody in their places who will be loyal to the Harding administration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And who will not talk to Joe Tumulty.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; who will not talk to Mr. Tumulty. There is a rather disconcerting thing about this interview, but I just want to read one other little extract. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, apparently in an interview, said:

Nothing was now pending in the bureau, Mr. Mellon stated, involving the honesty of any group of former employees, and there was nothing pointing to any individual. He said that while the politics of the former officials were known in a general way, in reality most of the employees of the bureau could be said to have no politics as they had no vote.

I read that much of his statement to show that the Secretary of the Treasury, under whose jurisdiction this bureau is, knew of no charge affecting the integrity of these men.

Let me call attention to this, and with it I shall close. There were four women who went down under this drastic and unjustifiable order of the President, women who had gone into the bureau years and years ago, who had toiled upward against all the obstacles that have been placed in the way of women's advancement in public employment through all the years, who had kept their reputations pure, who had perfected their efficiency and had finally come to places of responsibility and places that paid them well. Without an opportunity to be heard, without opportunity to utter one word in their own defense, and now with the statement from the Secretary of the Treasury that there was not a charge against them, they were all dismissed from the public service. They were turned out, their reputations destroyed, and the Post says, and it speaks for the administration, or always has, that the President does not intend ever to tell why he dismissed and disgraced these women.

I imagine that the women will also notice that not only did the President dismiss these women but filled their places with men. This administration shuts the door of hope in the face of women, who through long years of faithful service had toiled upwards to places of responsibility. They were summarily discharged and disgraced, and four good Republicans whose reputation will pass muster even with the junior Senator from Oklahoma, are given their places, and these four good Republicans are men.

I do not know, Mr. President, whether the President can afford to maintain his avowed intention of destroying the reputation of these men and women publicly and answering them privately by saying, "I am sorry if I hurt you, but I can not help it. I can not afford to make any public statement because I have no statement that the public would accept, and therefore you must bear your injury and love me as best you may."

With that, in conclusion, I have a resolution which I wish to ask unanimous consent out of order to introduce and have considered at this time. It is a resolution that deals with the article which I have read. I am sure no Senator can afford to object to it, because it involves the honor of the Senate and the House and the administration. I do not believe that the charges are true, and I want to give a chance to have them disproved.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have no objection to the presentation of the resolution. That much may be done out of order and not against the regular order, but I shall object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the presentation of the resolution at this time? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, at the request of several Senators I will ask that the resolution may be read, although it is a literal copy of the resolution introduced by Congressman MOORE of Virginia yesterday, with the exception that it adds a statement with reference to this article that charges there were irregularities amounting to fraud committed by men in the Treasury and that knowledge of that fact came to the administration and it was hushed up, and these men were dismissed and their places filled by others. That is the only new charge there is in it. I will ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Whereas pursuant to an——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. CARAWAY. There had already been a request for permission to have it read and no one had objected, and the Assistant Secretary had commenced to read. Objection can not come in the midst of reading the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the opinion of the Chair that objection lies at any time in the form of a point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does objection to the present consideration constitute an objection to the reading of the proposed resolution?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I objected to the present consideration of the resolution, but the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] calls now for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Which means an objection to the presentation of the resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, I still have the floor, and I will read it myself:

Whereas, pursuant to an order of the President—

I will inflict the Senate now because I can not read so melodiously as the Assistant Secretary.

Whereas, pursuant to an order of the President issued——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know the rule, but I call for the regular order.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not yield for that. I heard that very question tested out when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] had the floor in order to explain the bonus matter and saying he would not yield, and the Chair held that he, having the floor, could not be taken off of the floor in that way.

Mr. STERLING. During the course of the Senator's remarks on yesterday the regular order was called for——

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. STERLING. And the Senator from Arkansas yielded.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; I did that. I did that not because I thought it was right, but because it was so painful to some Senators on the other side of the Chamber that out of consideration for their feelings I quit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Arkansas refers to what happened yesterday. When the Senator was taken off the floor on yesterday it was because there was not anything then pending before the Senate. Now there is a bill pending before the Senate and there is also a pending amendment. The Senator from Arkansas is speaking to that amendment. He may talk about the Holy Bible if he desires to do so; nor is there anything to prevent him talking about the resolution. He is strictly in order under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I understood that the bill providing for the appointment of additional district judges was the business before the Senate at the time the regular order was called for.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. CARAWAY. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the objection was made during the morning hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Senate adjourn or take a recess upon yesterday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate then took a recess.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I shall again commence at the beginning and read the resolution. Senate Resolution 269 is as follows:

Whereas pursuant to an order of the President, issued the afternoon of March 31, and immediately effective, there was a wholesale removal of responsible officials of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the appointment of other officials in their stead; and

Whereas the order was made notwithstanding the law, which provides "that no person in the classified civil service of the United States shall be removed therefrom except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of said service and for reasons given in writing, and the person whose removal is sought shall have notice of the same and of any charges preferred against him and be furnished with a copy thereof and also be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing and affidavits in support thereof"; and

Whereas previous to being notified of their sudden dismissal by a letter from the Secretary to the President, accompanied by a copy of the President's order, none of the said persons, so far as they were aware, had been complained of to the Secretary of the Treasury, to whose department the Bureau of Engraving and Printing belongs, or complained of by him, or otherwise made the subject of complaint; and

Whereas the order recites that the action of the President dismissing the said persons was taken "for the good of the service," which carries the implication that the officials removed had been guilty of misconduct, which is a grave injustice to them if, as is alleged to be the fact, they are persons of capacity, character, and experience, who have discharged their duties faithfully and efficiently, some of them being officials whose inventions and improvements have been freely used by the Government to its great advantage, some of them having heretofore declined attractive offers of private employment because of their devotion to the interests of the Government, and some of them being war veterans; and

Whereas it was stated by the press at the time the order was issued that it was approved by the Attorney General, who was then in conference with the President, and it is now similarly stated that the Attorney General will cause an ex parte investigation of conditions in the bureau for the purpose, apparently, of determining whether the order, already executed, was justified by the facts; and

Whereas in view of his recent utterances, which shows that he is hostile to the general policy embodied in the civil service law, such an investigation made and any decision promulgated by the Attorney General would hardly inspire public confidence; and

Whereas it is in every sense proper and desirable that there should be a thorough and impartial inquiry into every feature of the transaction in question; and

Whereas it is also now charged that irregularities amounting to theft have occurred in said bureau; and

Whereas it is in the public press charged that the people were dismissed to prevent those who sought their dismissal from exposing these irregularities; and

Whereas it is charged that a Member of this Senate knew of said irregularities; and

Whereas if said statement in said publications be true, said acts would in fact be a compounding of a felony: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the Senate appoint a committee of five Members, who shall ascertain and report:

The specific facts and reasons upon which the order is based, and by what, if any, real investigation it was preceded; whether the persons removed, or any of them, have failed in the performance of their duties; whether there is ground for believing that the good of the service is likely to be promoted by their removal or by the new appointments; and whether or not the facts indicate that the order may be regarded as a step in the direction of a return to the discredited spoils system by disregarding the spirit and, as is also claimed, the letter of the civil service law. Also find what, if any, basis of fact there is in the story of irregularities charged and the compounding thereof.

Mr. President, I shall ask immediate consideration for the resolution, hoping that the Senator from South Dakota, realizing the impropriety of permitting the charge to go forth that the administration had compounded a felony and that a Member of the Senate had knowledge of it, will not object to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I note what the Senator from Arkansas has said and the implication contained in his words with reference to the President, that the President had assisted in compounding a felony, and so forth. Of course, I resent anything like that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, let us resent it by permitting the investigation to be immediately had and prove that it is not true. I do not think it is true; but it is charged.

Mr. STERLING. I object to the present consideration of the resolution and ask that it go over under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. NELSON. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. CARAWAY. The regular order is that I have the floor. I am not going to have anything more to say about the resolution, except that, inasmuch as the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] says he resents the imputation of the charge against the President, I resent it, too; I do not believe it is true. The President is not a member of my party, but if he were I would not by an objection of mine prevent the facts being immediately known. If a charge is made against the President of these United States, whether the President is of my party or not, I should be anxious to develop from what facts he deduced the charges. If it is not true—and I do not believe it is—let us denounce the charge by ascertaining the facts and not sit here in the Senate and say "I resent it," and at the same time "I object to the consideration of the resolution."

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, for the greater part of two mornings the Senate has now listened to what, at times at least, has degenerated into the character of a personal diatribe directed against the President of the United States. The President is uninjured by anything of the kind, especially coming from the source from which it emanates.

Mr. President, there are times when not even the President of the United States can take—I did not quite catch the remark of the Senator from Utah. Was it directed to me?

Mr. KING. I was not addressing myself to the Senator, but if the Senator is very anxious to know what I said I shall be glad to advise him.

Mr. NEW. It was the remark about which I inquired.

Mr. KING. I repeat, I was not addressing myself to the Senator, but I have no objection to telling him what I said.

Mr. NEW. The remark was uttered in such an audible tone that I thought it might have been addressed to me; that was all.

Mr. President, as I have said, there are times when not even the President of the United States may make public every motive that actuates him and every reason which impels action on his part; and the action which was taken two or three days ago with reference to removals in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing falls within that category. There were good and sufficient reasons for the President's action; but whether or not they will be given to the public, I can not say. Much depends upon circumstances; but reasons exist just the same and are amply sufficient to warrant the action taken by the President.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the indignation of the Senator from Arkansas is based entirely upon the removal of the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and a few other employees who were removed concurrently with him.

A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation, bitter weeping.

It appears that some of the faithful are about to be separated from the public service, and it creates great indignation on the other side of the Chamber. If in the spring of 1913 Senators on this side of the aisle had taken notice of events of a similar character to those of which the Senator from Arkansas now so vociferously complains, there would not have been room in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for anything else. Mr. President, I undertake to say and to attempt to justify by the facts that there never was so partisan an administration as the one which closed on the 4th day of March, 1921. That administration filled up the departments here with incompetents to the point where if a caller on business wanted to reach the head of one of the departments he had to elbow his way through a crowd, like getting up to the ticket wagon of a circus; it was almost like a salmon run in Alaska in the spring, when the fish, seeking the upper stretches of the fresh water, so fill the streams that they crowd each other out on the banks. That was the condition in regard to the departmental offices; the appointees fairly crowded each other out on the sidewalk. Ten thousand of them have, very happily, been separated from the service since the present administration came in; a great many more thousands can be separated to the very great benefit of the service; and, speaking for myself, I very earnestly hope they may be; but whether or not they shall be, I do not undertake to say. I can, however, at least express the hope that they may be.

Mr. President, I do not know that I have anything more to say on this subject. The reason for the removals in this case was stated to be for the benefit of the public service. As I said in the beginning, and now repeat, there are times and circumstances when all the reasons which actuate the Executive can not with propriety be stated, and this is one of them.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator regard the removal of a Democrat and the placing in his stead a good loyal Republican as a sufficient reason for the change?

Mr. NEW. It certainly would be to me, if that question is addressed to me personally.

Mr. STANLEY. I admire the Senator for the candor of his utterances, and, although I hold no brief for the civil service, I presume he speaks for his chief.

Mr. NEW. That is merely the Senator's presumption, of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am very much surprised at the open statement of the Senator from Indiana that in order to give a place to a Republican it would be a sufficient reason to discharge without any allegations and without any hearing a Democrat under the protection of the civil service law. The civil service law is a statute of the United States, just as much entitled to be respected and observed as any other law; and yet the Senator from Indiana deliberately says to the Senate and to the country that it would be a sufficient reason, as far as he is concerned, to discharge a man under the supposed protection of the civil service law because he was a Democrat and could be replaced by a Republican.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. NEW. The Senator from Indiana said nothing of the kind. The Senator from Kentucky asked the Senator from Indiana if he would regard it as a good and sufficient reason to replace a Democrat with a Republican, and I said that to me it certainly would. No mention was made of the civil service law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, we are dealing now with the cases of men who were under the protection of the civil service law; and the Senator from Indiana has avowed, apparently referring to them, that so far as he is concerned it would be a sufficient reason to violate the law, discharge the men, and put in other men for political reasons.

But, Mr. President, what the Senator from Indiana thus frankly avows has been since the very advent of this administration apparently the deliberate purpose of this administration, particularly in one department of the Government. I refer to the Post Office Department. It is a matter of common knowledge, held by all men who have come in contact with the subject, that for more than a year the Post Office Department has been run and operated as a political machine, and under the Executive order issued by the President of the United States all postmasters have been appointed wholly upon the consideration of political reasons.

The pretense of an examination has been continued—examinations which during the administration of Woodrow Wilson were strictly lived up to; examinations which were lived up to to the extent of appointing the man who received the highest rating under his civil-service examination, even if the Congressman protested against it, and even if the Senator protested against it; those appointments were made under the civil-service ratings nevertheless. In fact, my judgment is that the matter was carried to too great an extreme, because in that way presidential appointments were virtually transferred to the comparatively obscure examiners who made these examinations and reports. I think it was carried to too great an extreme; but under the present administration we have gone to the other extreme, and it has been almost the rule in making appointments that men or women with high ratings have been ignored, and men or women with inferior ratings have been preferred.

That is not all, Mr. President. It is susceptible of proof that when no available Republican was found upon the list after a civil-service examination the Post Office Department has required the Civil Service Commission to go back and rerate the men or the women in order that a Republican applicant might be put upon the list. I think that is a matter which is susceptible of proof, and, if necessary, it can be produced.

Mr. President, I want now to refer the Senator from Indiana to a case of which I have personal knowledge in my State.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. NEW. I merely want to say that I hope there are instances in which that can be proven. It would be a great relief to me, at least, to be able to prove it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say this of the Senator from Indiana: At least he is not a hypocrite; and one of the charges which can be brought against this administration is that it is proceeding in a hypocritical manner. It is holding out to the great mass of the people who believe in the civil-service law that it is living up to the civil-service law, and here in Washington, in responding to the demands of politicians in the House and in the Senate, the civil-service law is being deliberately and systematically violated.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. The President of the United States could not do a better thing to save his face in his present sad predicament than to come out boldly and say what the Senator from Indiana has the courage and the manhood to say, but which he will never say. Better, a thousand times better, to proclaim himself a bold and an honest spoilsman than to "wear the livery of God to serve the devil in."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, there are a number of instances that have come under my observation, and there are, as I happen to know, a large number of instances that have come under the observation of all Senators, particularly on this side of the aisle, who felt that at some time the matter should be aired and that public opinion should be appealed to. I am going to take up one case in my State—the case of the postmaster at Clay Center, Nebr., a comparatively small town, a postmaster who served four years and was reappointed by the previous administration, and who still had two years to serve. Charges were brought against him, and two inspectors were sent out to Clay Center for an investigation. They made a lengthy report, of which I have a copy, which I read with care, and as a matter of fact the report recited facts which were to the man's credit, and if time afforded I could give extracts from that report here; but it wound up with the statement that for the good of the service and the town they recommended his removal.

I took up that matter with the department, with the then Assistant Postmaster General, and later with the Postmaster General, at that time Mr. Hays; and they admitted in my presence that it was so weak a report that it was very doubtful whether it would be acted upon. The facts stated in the report were so insufficient that Postmaster General Hays in my presence stated to the Assistant Postmaster General that he did not think that report would warrant a removal; but, Mr. President, the postmaster was summarily removed a few weeks later, and I am going to read now to the Senate some letters which will indicate the real reason of his removal. I have not all of the matter here, but I have hastily gathered a few letters.

I hold, first, in my hand a copy of a letter written by Fred B. Howard—a Republican editor of that town, Clay Center, Nebr.—dated October 4, 1921. It is addressed to Hon. W. E. ANDREWS, the Congressman from that district, and reads as follows:

MY DEAR MR. ANDREWS: By the use of the party whip, by the use of business threats, and by the use of misstatements in their petitions, it seems that the Thompson faction—

Thompson was the postmaster in question, in Clay Center—

That the Thompson faction have been able to make such a showing in the post-office matter here that it is about to be reopened. Positively, this must not be. After what has taken place there can be no back up without completely discrediting the party in this territory and making our delegation in Congress as well as ourselves the laughing-stock of the district. It is inconceivable that Senator HITCHCOCK should be able to override the judgment of the department based on an official investigation; and if this should prove to be true it will be a sad day for our workers in this district. I trust you will see the necessity of bringing every power possible to bear, not merely for the obtaining of needed relief in Clay Center, but in the final analysis for the saving of a bunch of faithful men from humiliation that will spell defeat for them and their friends in the approaching campaign.

Yours truly,

FRED B. HOWARD.

That letter was addressed, as I say, to the Republican Congressman from that district, and it was followed by another, written by the Republican governor of Nebraska, and it reads as follows:

Hon. W. E. ANDREWS.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN ANDREWS: I am writing you regarding the post-office situation in Clay Center. I expect you are aware of the fact that the present postmaster is a Democrat; has served off and on in that position for a number of years.

It was always "on"; it was not "off." He has been postmaster for six continuous years.

I do not think he has been popular in the place, and I know he has carried his partisanship to the extreme. In fact, that has been the nucleus of a little organization of Democrats in that community that has been unwavering in its opposition to the Republican Party and its representatives. I am wondering if something can not be done to bring about a change there. It should be done. I will greatly appreciate anything you can do to help out this situation. If there is any influence that I can use, please command me.

About that time there appears in the files of the Postmaster General relating to Clay Center this official memorandum:

Under date of September 8, Representative ANDREWS telegraphed from Nebraska his recommendation for the appointment of an acting postmaster, and within past few days has repeatedly telephoned the department insisting that action be taken to displace the postmaster and appoint an acting postmaster there.

Under date of October 4, Congressman ANDREWS telegraphed Hon. Will H. Hays, Postmaster General, Washington, D. C., as follows:

MY DEAR MR. HAYS: I am greatly embarrassed by the unexpected delay of the department action in the appointment of an acting postmaster at Clay Center, Nebr.

W. E. ANDREWS.

Then, under date of October 7, the same Congressman, W. E. ANDREWS, addressed a long letter to Mr. Hays, Postmaster General. I shall read only a part of it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 7, 1921.

Hon. WILL H. HAYS,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAYS: I hand you herewith a letter which I have just received from Mr. Fred B. Howard, congressional committeeman for Clay County, Nebr. You will observe that he is editor of the Clay County Sun. He is one of the most effective newspaper men in the fifth congressional district of Nebraska. He publishes a good paper, and has a wide range of influence. His letter states the facts correctly from the party standpoint. It is very unfortunate for the Republican Party and that locality to be compelled to endure the last 20 days of this man Thompson. Thompson's political activity has been well known to everybody and can not be truthfully denied. Senator HITCHCOCK is battling for votes for next year for himself. The retention of Thompson as postmaster means the humiliation of Republicans in that locality, and it may count heavily in the matter of the senatorial election.

Then I quote now from a letter written by the same Fred B. Howard to the First Assistant Postmaster General, December 5, 1921:

A bunch of men who have never been found wanting when the party made an appeal are now in a most embarrassing position, and if you would save the organization, which has been and will continue to be effective if treated just fairly, you will enforce the original order of the department without further delay. If the situation did not warrant this urgent request, I would not make it.

Mr. President, there had been no original order. All there had been was a report of two inspectors who had been sent to Clay Center, and that report, by the confession of the Postmaster General in my presence, and in the presence of the then Assistant Postmaster General, had been so weak that he could not remove the man, and he did not remove the man until this insistent political demand came from Clay Center.

I have said that I have some regard for an outspoken, defiant attitude, like that of the Senator from Indiana, against the civil-service law, but who can defend an administration which stands apparently for the enforcement of the civil service, which stands apparently for the appointment of postmasters after a civil-service examination, which stands apparently for the idea that when a postmaster is appointed he shall hold his office for four years, as the law provides he shall, and then, after making all that pretense to the country, secretly yields to this political influence for the removal of a man two years before his term expires?

Mr. President, I have stated that the Post Office Department, using its great influence, and evidently with the backing of the President of the United States, had compelled the Civil Service Commission to go over its ratings when it had reported a number of candidates for a post office and none of them happened to be a Republican. Let me read a letter, of which I hold the original in my hand, from the Hon. MOSES P. KINKAID, a Representative from the State of Nebraska in the Lower House, and, of course, a Republican. It is dated November 12, 1921, at Washington, addressed to a citizen of his district. I believe I will omit his name. It reads:

FRIEND SO-AND-SO: I am in receipt of your esteemed favor of the 5th instant, written in behalf of the candidacy of the former resident of your city, Mr. O. O. Howard, for the postmastership at Ericson. Will say Howard himself wrote me recently in the premises, and in the acknowledgment I made of the receipt of his letter I informed him of the status, which is that a civil-service examination has already been conducted of candidates for the Ericson office, with the result that but one candidate was reported as eligible, he the Democratic editor at Ericson.

Consequently, if that report is to stand, we would have no recourse but to permit the appointment of this Democratic editor; but I have secured an order to be made for the examination papers to be reviewed, and inasmuch as the Republican candidate barely failed to come up to the requirements it is possible that she may yet be found eligible. If so, she should receive the appointment, as she has been indorsed by the Republican patrons. In the event of the case being opened up to new candidates, what you say of the worthiness of Mr. Howard, and that fortified by so many signers of your letter, all old acquaintances of Mr. Howard, will be given due consideration.

With best wishes I remain,

Sincerely yours,

M. P. KINKAID.

I may say, furthermore, that the papers were rerated, and Mrs. Patrick was appointed, evidently under the dictation of the Post Office Department. I took the liberty of holding up that nomination when it came to the Senate, and finally the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads notified the Post Office Department that the nomination was subject to very serious objection, and it was abandoned. But that letter shows and the act shows that there is a deliberate attempt to subvert and to destroy the civil service as applied, at least, to the post offices of the country. I think it is perfectly proper to cite that at this time, while it has nothing to do with the Treasury Department, as an evidence that the Treasury Department is not the only department in which this hypocritical attempt is being made to observe the law while in reality it is being destroyed.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, the Senator will not forget that the Post Office Department, although an advantage of five points is supposed to be given to ex-soldiers in their markings, is turning them down.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have received a great many complaints from ex-soldiers who claim that while they were given preference under the former administration, they appear now to be discriminated against, and I heard of a case this morning in which an ex-soldier who had received the highest rating and who required no favor of five points was refused the appointment.

Mr. DIAL. Even Republican ex-soldiers are being discriminated against.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So I say that if there is in this country any sentiment which holds that the civil service law should be made a fact and not a farce it is about time for that sentiment to develop itself, and it is about time for this administration to either fish or cut bait in the matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator contend that the civil service law is applicable to the appointment of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not, but I contend that prior to the election of 1916 the Civil Service Association of the United States addressed a letter to Woodrow Wilson and an identical letter to the Republican candidate for President, asking them whether they would take the necessary steps by Executive order to place those post offices of the country under the protection of the civil service, in order to remove the scandal which had grown up as a result of the spoils system, and both those candidates, one representing the Republican Party and the other representing the Democratic Party, replied to the Civil Service Association that they would do so. Woodrow Wilson was elected, and he carried out to the letter the promise which he made. I furthermore say that when this administration came into office President Harding issued an Executive order in which he stated that the practice would be followed to this extent, that an examination would be held under the authority of the Civil Service Commission; that the commission should report to the Post Office Department the highest three as eligible. I am not certain how much further that order went, but I know that the Civil Service Commission, which ought to stand up and fight for the law under which it exists, has yielded to the importunities of the Post Office Department in many cases and has revised its ratings. I would like to inquire also what has become of the resolution which the Senate adopted a while ago authorizing and directing a committee of the Senate to inquire into that abuse. Have any meetings been held? Have any facts been developed? Has any report been made?

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator state that President Wilson placed all these offices in the classified service?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not say he placed them in the classified service. He issued an Executive order directing that all appointments should be made after the Civil Service Commission had caused an examination to be held and had placed upon the eligible list the names of the three having the highest rating, and the man or the woman with the highest rating would receive the appointment, and that was done.

Mr. LENROOT. Was it placed in the Executive order that the person having the highest rating should get the appointment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator state when that was done?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was done almost immediately after Woodrow Wilson began his second term of office.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall be glad if the Senator will put in the RECORD any such order issued at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Was my colleague in favor of the civil-service arrangement for postmasters when President Wilson put it in practice?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thought it was too extreme, and I told the President so. I said so here.

Mr. NORRIS. What was the part of it which the Senator thought was too extreme?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thought it left no discretion at all to the President of the United States. The Constitution vests in the President of the United States the power to appoint, and he should be left some discretion; but he made the order so rigid, in order to live up to the promise which he had made to the Civil Service Association, that if one person were given a rating of 94 by a civil-service examiner and another person were given a rating of 93, he could not exercise any discretion at all. I think there should be a discretion exercised, but I think there should not be a pretense made and an almost universal rule followed of disregarding those ratings, and then subordinating the commission to be a mere tool of the Post Office Department, by compelling it to rerate and rerate until a Republican shall get on the list; and I do not believe my colleague believes that is right.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to express myself on the subject just as soon as I can get the floor in my own right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will yield the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. But I want to ask my colleague another question. I take it, then, that my colleague prefers the order of President Harding to that made by President Wilson, because President Harding did retain the discretionary power as to the three highest on the list, instead of none, as President Wilson had made it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there should be some discretion left to the appointing power, but I do not think that by that means the civil service should be made a farce, and I do not believe that the Civil Service Commission should be degraded, as it has been degraded, into a mere tool of Republican politicians, and that their ratings should be made farcical, and revised and revised until a Republican could get on the list. That is what I believe.

Mr. NORRIS. Going back to my question again, so that the Senator will have it recalled to him, he then prefers the order of President Harding to the order of President Wilson, as far as the order is concerned?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not complaining of the order. I am complaining of its execution. I am complaining of the hypocrisy of making such an order under the pretense that it is for the purpose of allowing men of any party to take examinations and have a chance of being appointed, and then, if no Republican is on the list, sending the papers back time and time again to the Civil Service Commission with orders to revise and rerate. That is the practice I object to.

Mr. NORRIS. I go back again to my question, and repeat it——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I answer it in the same way.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not answered it yet. I would like to know definitely whether the Senator prefers the order made by President Harding to the order made by President Wilson.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I answer it in the same way that I did before, but I do not believe in having it applied in such a farcical and practically hypocritical way as it has been applied.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have said before, and I want to repeat now, so that my opinion may be understood for whatever it may be worth, I never agreed with the order of President Harding where he provided that postmasters should be selected from the three highest on the list. I preferred the order made by President Wilson, which took away the discretionary power that was given to politicians. I am going to demonstrate by reciting some things which have happened that my colleague not only did not believe in civil service as far as appointments to post offices were concerned, but that he went so far as to make very serious charges against the Postmaster General under President Wilson because he took these post offices off the political pie counter. He is complaining now, and I think with justification, that the Republican President is putting them on the pie counter. The only difference between my colleague and myself is that I believe in the civil service when my party is in power as well as when the other party is in power, and he believes in the civil service when the Republican Party is in power, and that "to the victors belong the spoils" when the Democrats are in control; and I am going to prove it.

The tears he is shedding now for the civil service were tears of stone when Woodrow Wilson was in the White House. He is now anxious that postmasters should be selected on a competitive basis, and is complaining because the officials are putting Democrats out and Republicans in; but when Woodrow Wilson was in power, and before my colleague's reelection to the Senate was so close at hand, he was demanding that Democratic politicians be placed in the post offices, and that the Civil Service Commission should be scrapped. He even went so far, as I said, to make serious charges, through his private secretary, against the Postmaster General.

Mr. President, lest I be misunderstood, I want to say here that I think President Harding made a mistake when he changed the order. He has made a mistake in every case since wherever he or anybody under him has permitted political influence to interfere in the appointment of postmasters.

But when Woodrow Wilson was President and that order was made it was quite a common thing, after the postmaster had been selected according to the examination, to have it held up in the Senate of the United States by the political influence of my colleague in my State of Nebraska. It was my colleague who, after the order had been obeyed and the postmaster selected according to the civil service, got from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate the papers in the case, stuck them in his pocket, and carried them there for the balance of the session, so that when Congress adjourned another appointment had to be made, and who then, when it was made again, repeated the operation and carried the papers during another session of Congress. Oh, he was anxious then to enforce the civil service law. Oh, he was then performing a piece of statesmanship that would put the whole Harding administration back into the ditch and make them look like 30 cents. Then it was that there was no virtue in the civil service law. Then it was that the only way to get good administration was to turn men out and put men in—turn them out because they were Republicans, put them in because they were Democrats.

It was during that administration, in a case where the civil-service examination in Nebraska showed that a contest between a Republican and a Democrat resulted in the Republican getting the highest standing on the list, that my colleague went to the Post Office Department and asked that an inspector be sent out there. It was in answer to my colleague's request that a post-office inspector be sent out there that one went there, went into the town where this thing had taken place, and went to see only men who were personal enemies of the Republican successful aspirant. It was in that case where they adopted the cowardly and inhuman method of charging the successful man with being pro-German, and there is something in some of the letters which I shall read later which will indicate that that did not originate in the department but originated here in the Capitol; not only in the Capitol but in my colleague's office in the Capitol, where his secretary, who signed the letters, had charge and full sway. A charge was made because of the lack of pains on the part of the President to make a personal investigation.

I said it was inhuman. It was not only inhuman but it was cowardly. The man never had the right or the opportunity to defend himself, and yet it was shown in the investigation that I made—and I defy any man to investigate and show to the contrary—that in every activity during the war this man led. He subscribed for more Liberty bonds than his quota called for. He was charged with making, at a meeting of the Eastern Star lodge, a mean remark about the President of the United States, and it was demonstrated and proven that the charge was absolutely false and without any foundation whatever.

Then, under that kind of régime, when I went down to ask for the papers, when I went into the First Assistant Postmaster General's office in the city of Washington and asked that I be given the papers, that I be allowed to see what this report was, what investigation the inspector had made, I was denied the right to see the papers, and I did not see them, either.

I was denied that right when, as a matter of fact, everybody knows the Senate has a constitutional duty to pass on the confirmation of postmasters. That was under an administration where the civil-service rule had been complied with, but the officials of the Post Office Department and my colleague, conniving together, had brought about in the Senate of the United States, by his carrying the papers away with him, the defeat of the civil-service rule adopted by President Wilson.

I thought, Mr. President, when I was denied access to these papers, that if I called attention to it in the Senate of the United States an investigation would be immediately demanded and unanimously put through, but it was not. I did that; I told about it on the floor of the Senate, that I had been denied that right. I know of one of these cases that happened in my State, and I would not bring my State in here if my colleague had not done it. He has brought the dirty linen out, and I am going to give it another dose or two of soap. That is all I am trying to do.

It seemed to me humiliating that while the order was made all right and the Civil Service Commission carried it out all right, in these cases in the State of Nebraska, at least, the First Assistant Postmaster General, in connection with my colleague and with the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, who was a Democrat, prevented, whenever they did not like it, the carrying out of President Wilson's order.

Now, let us see how my colleague, who is such a great civil-service reformer now, felt when he was not running for reelection and when his party was in power. At the time these letters, which I am about to read, were written there was a man here by the name of Earl B. Gaddis, who was private secretary to my colleague. Gaddis was also at that time Washington correspondent of the Omaha World-Herald, a great Democratic newspaper printed in Omaha, owned, edited, and published by my colleague. Other newspapers who had their representatives here had them admitted to the Senate press gallery, but the representative of the Omaha World-Herald could not be admitted to the press gallery because he was being paid by Uncle Sam and held a job at the pleasure and good will of my colleague, and it was contrary to the rules to admit such men to the press gallery. So he could not be admitted there. But he had an advantage which the men sitting in the press gallery of the Senate did not have. By virtue of the appointment given him by my colleague he was admited right on the floor of the Senate, so he had an opportunity to get the inside every time, and he did.

But while acting in this capacity, as my colleague's private secretary, Gaddis had some correspondence in regard to this very post office out in the State of Nebraska. There had been a civil-service examination held out there, and the favored Democrat did not get in. He was defeated in the examination and lost the office. In one case it was a woman, so he had some correspondence with this woman, and he wrote her as follows. The letter is dated, "United States Senate, Washington, D. C., May 31, 1919," and addressed:

MY DEAR MRS. WEEKES:

I have your letter and hasten to reply.

Burleson says: "Result of examination is only thing that will count—no politics—makes no difference if a Republican is chosen."

That is the kind of a Postmaster General we have, and this is what makes the Democrats boiling hot and has caused numbers of them to band together to insist upon Burleson's removal.

HITCHCOCK was the only Democrat in Congress to voice a protest against Burleson's tyranny, and, of course, Burleson didn't like it.

Think of it! There he sits, the only man in the Senate who had the courage to attack the great Burleson and denounce him as a tyrant. Here are his praises being sung by another great man of his own choosing, his private secretary, his newspaper correspondent, his newspaper editor, drawing a salary and getting his pay from Uncle Sam.

I continue the reading:

HITCHCOCK was the only Democrat in Congress to voice a protest against Burleson's tyranny, and, of course, Burleson didn't like it.

We will likely suffer distinct embarrassment one of these days of seeing a Republican newspaper man who writes bitterly partisan copy being chosen to supplant a Democrat in one of our good Nebraska towns. We held the appointment up for a long time—

I told you a while ago how—by checkmating confirmation, but will be unable to do so with a Republican majority.

In other words, this faithful follower of the World-Herald and of the senior Senator from Nebraska and financially of Uncle Sam, says, "We did the work all right by having HITCHCOCK prevent confirmation." He saved the country for civil service notwithstanding "Burleson, the tyrant," but now we are about to have a Republican majority, and he can not do it any longer, powerful though he may be.

Again reading from the letter:

All of this is a burning shame, but Burleson, the tyrant, has the upper hand and proposes to keep it.

I hope Burleson will take notice in his retirement.

There is one ray of light, however, and it may penetrate the dark recesses to Democratic advantage before the Norfolk postmaster is chosen.

This letter is directed to Mrs. Weekes, who lives in Norfolk, and was a candidate for postmaster there. Continuing:

If Burleson is removed before the appointment comes, it may be that his successor will see to it that justice is done—

He has disclosed the kind of justice he wants—

I will watch developments closely and will keep you advised.

Again I say Burleson should be "strafed," then Democracy would stand at least an even chance of survival. Otherwise I fear the sins of this tyrant will be visited upon our party for years to come.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

EARL B. GADDIS,
Secretary to Senator Hitchcock.

Mr. President, I think I ought to continue the reading. There is some more along the same line. That letter was written May 31, 1919; and on the 31st of July, of the same year, Mr. Gaddis wrote another letter, which I think I ought to read, because it throws some light upon my colleague's conversion to civil-service reform, under a Republican administration, which he so much despised under a Democratic administration. The letter starts out:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., July 31, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. WEEKES—

This letter was apparently written to Mr. Weekes, although the previous letter was addressed to "Mrs. Weekes"—

Have your letter of the 19th, and hasten to reply to it.

Reference to the Ainsworth matter—

That was another postmastership case where the sleight-of-hand performance took place by which a Republican was put out and a Democrat put in—the Ainsworth matter, which you mention as having been cited to you in the Senator's letter of May 31—the Senator could not obtain the appointment of a man there friendly to the Democratic cause.

Now the Senator is trying to get postmasters appointed according to the civil service, but it seems then that he was trying to get postmasters who were "friendly to the Democratic cause." Now listen to this:

When a Republican was named he managed to hold up the appointment—

Consider that in connection with the Senator's denunciation to-day of Republicans trying to prevent the operation of the civil-service rule. The Republicans learned their lesson from the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]; that is the reason they do it so well. He is condemning them now because they will not let the civil-service rule be put in force, and yet his secretary says that he was then trying his best to prevent its enforcement, but did not always succeed, as is shown here, but he held up the appointment for a long time.

The Senator could not obtain the appointment of a man there friendly to the Democratic cause.

When a Republican was named he managed to hold up the appointment. That was all he could do.

That, in other words, was interfering with the rule, but the Senator now condemns others for interfering with the rule.

But now, under a Republican Senate, he will be forced to give up that and must see a shameless Republican named for the place. At no time, under this new system of Burleson's, did the Senator have the remotest chance of naming a Democratic friend.

Too bad, was it not?

Also with reference to the Scottsbluff matter—

Scottsbluff is another post office in Nebraska—

mentioned in Arthur Mullen's office—

Arthur Mullen is the Democratic national committeeman from the State of Nebraska, and is a very fine man—mentioned in Arthur Mullen's office in Mrs. W.'s presence—we did not wire for the name of a man to name there. We merely suggested to Arthur that he get some Democrats in the examination there who might stand strong chances of passing the examination.

It seems that my colleague was in doubt whether or not Democrats could pass the examination.

We made it perfectly plain to Arthur that our only hope lay in getting some Democrat in the race there who could stand the examination.

I might add that the outlook now is that a Republican topped the list and must be named for the place. HITCHCOCK has no more chance of getting a Democrat in there than a snowball has in August weather in Nebraska.

That is too bad, especially in the case of a man who is now such a great and ardent admirer of the civil service!

So you see, with these facts in your possession, there is anything but politics being indulged in by the administration in naming of postmasters.

Senator HITCHCOCK has agreed with few things which this man Burleson has done since taking office, particularly since the war came on. And he has voiced that disagreement, as many other Democrats have done. But not a Democrat here in Washington has the least thing to do with the naming of postmasters. All they can do is get their friends to take examinations and pray that civil-service marks will lead later to their elevation to the places. That is all the good Lord could do if He were a Democrat now and here trying to get justice for His party in the naming of His postmasters.

If Gentle, at Norfolk, is not a loyal American—

Now, here is a hint; here is a way to hold up a nomination. Gentle was a Republican; he was a candidate for postmaster, and Senator HITCHCOCK's private secretary says this is the way to hold up the nomination. He says:

If Gentle, at Norfolk, is not a loyal American or is an immoral citizen, his appointment can be held up. But these are the only grounds upon which there is the slightest show of keeping him out of the place.

I agree with what you say about the damned inconsistencies in running the Post Office Department this way. It is a shame that we must endure it, the Lord knows; but the game can not be beaten the way it is played just now. Thank Heaven, there may be a way opened up later whereby it can be beaten; but when that time comes it may be too close to the time the Republicans will take the administration away from us simply because they play politics up to the limit all the time.

Arthur Mullen understands the difficulties precisely. Talk the matter over with him some time, or if you are in Omaha on July 24, when the national chairman and his party are there, join them and hear what they've got to say on the subject.

With kind regards and best wishes,

EARL B. GADDIS,
Secretary to Senator Hitchcock.

Mr. President, it will be noted that a suggestion is there made as to how appointments can be prevented. The civil-service rule is in force and there is no way to prevent the appointment, but the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the great civil-service statesman, is here ready and willing and able, if the evidence is furnished him, to prevent confirmation. A charge must be made that the successful Republican aspirant is not a true American or that his character is immoral, and the senior Senator from Nebraska will hold the nomination up and prevent confirmation. As I said awhile ago, he succeeded over two sessions of Congress in holding them up, without any charges being filed, simply by putting the papers in his pocket and carrying them away.

Mr. President, I have some more letters of a similar import, but I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read them at this moment. I wish to repeat what I said the other day, that for the man who says, "I am against the civil service in the Post Office Department or any other department and I believe when the opposition party is in power they have the right to wipe the slate clean and put their people in and the other fellows out for partisan reasons," I have nothing but admiration. I do not agree with him; I think he is wrong; but that is only my opinion. He may be right and I may be wrong; but, Mr. President, any party, no matter what party, and any man, no matter what man, who stands for civil-service enforcement when the opposition party is in power and for the abolishment of civil service when his own party is in power is, in my judgment, not a good public servant; he is not consistent; he is asking something of his enemies which he himself is not willing to concede. So when my colleague talks at length in the Senate condemning Republican officials for disobeying the civil service law, I agree with him in every instance where it can be shown that they have disregarded the law, and when any Senator says in his place here that he thinks such a violation has been committed, I will by my vote assist him in securing an investigation if he wants it; but, Mr. President, it seems to me——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I have not heard all of the Senator's remarks, but I should like to get his opinion frankly as to this state of affairs: We have what is called a civil-service examination for postmasters; and if only one person takes the examination and passes, instead of appointing him they order a new examination. When the new examination comes on, if there are two or three who take the examination, and any Republican gets across the dead line he is appointed, and the Democrat who first took the examination alone and passed, who in the second instance has passed at the head of the list, is denied the place. What does the Senator think of that kind of civil service?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it is any good. I condemn it. I think it is wrong. I am not defending it.

Mr. REED. I know the Senator is not.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not intend to defend it. I condemn it just as quickly when it is done by my party as though it were done by the Senator's party.

Mr. REED. Let me say to the Senator that that is the regular practice now. I am not defending it, and I am not particularly criticizing it, for I think we had some of that kind of thing in a degree, at least, under a previous administration.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; we did.

Mr. REED. But it seems to me that that kind of a civil service is a mere bit of contemptible chicanery.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is, and nobody condemns it more severely than I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator just let me comment for a moment upon that?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will permit me, I want to observe that the Committee on Civil Service, of which I am a member, but whose meetings I have not been able to attend, has been for the last two or three weeks conducting an investigation upon a resolution introduced either by the junior or by the senior Senator from Arkansas. It has taken very considerable testimony. It has received the report of the Civil Service Commission upon every case that has been referred to by either of these Senators and possibly others. That committee is meeting this afternoon for the purpose of formulating its report, as I understand. It seems to me that before condemning the Civil Service Commission we ought to await the coming in of this report.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not willing for the Senator to put me in the attitude of condemning the Civil Service Commission. I have not done it.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I know the Senator from Nebraska has not. The Senator from Missouri has.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand that the Senator from Missouri has. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CUMMINS. If not the Senator from Missouri, then the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has condemned it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think he has.

Mr. CUMMINS. I venture to say that whatever may have been the derelictions of the Post Office Department—I think they have not been investigated—so far as the Civil Service Commission is concerned, I do not believe that it has been guilty of the things which have been charged against it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not making a charge against the Civil Service Commission. My colleague has done so. I do not know what the facts are that he has ascertained in regard to the Civil Service Commission. If they are true, then I will join with him in their condemnation. He says, in effect, that the Post Office Department has compelled—that is the word he used, I think—the Civil Service Commission to have another examination, or something of that kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe that is true; but it will all appear in the report of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad the committee is investigating.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I have not been talking about the Civil Service Commission, and I did not know that there was an investigation. I am talking about the administration of this law as it applies to the Post Office Department. I think that I can produce letters from the Postmaster General or his assistant bearing out the statement that I made in regard to their ordering new examinations when only one person took the examination. I think I can take the record then and show that after the second examination had been called they had appointed a man who stood lower on the list than the man who first took the examination, and who took it the second time. I think that is the regular practice.

As I said, I am not rising to criticize anybody particularly; but I wanted to get the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska as to whether that kind of a civil service was any civil service at all, in the proper meaning of the word.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there may have been some irregularities. I do not know. I am not familiar with the testimony adduced, and I do not know what the report will be.

Mr. REED. I am not talking about irregularities. I am talking about customs.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the Executive order, as has been stated here many times, the Postmaster General may appoint one of the three persons receiving the highest ratings in the examination. What the Postmaster General has done in these instances, I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand the practical working of the order, it is this: President Harding modified the order of President Wilson so that it now provides that in the case of first, second, and third class offices the Civil Service Commission shall hold an examination, and the President will appoint from the three highest on the list. In order for the President to know which one of those to appoint, the Post Office Department submits the three highest on the list to the Republican Congressman of the district in which the post office is located, if there is a Republican Congressman; if there is not a Republican Congressman in that district, he submits the name to somebody else connected with the party machinery, and the selection is made, and that is certified to the President by the Post Office Department, and he makes that appointment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish first. I want to say that, in my judgment, that is entirely a nullification of the spirit of civil-service appointment of postmasters. There was talk about it very soon after President Harding went in; and, so that there might be no mistake about it, I wrote a letter to Postmaster General Hays calling his attention to that fact, and told him what I believed would be a serious result if they made such an order. It will in time result in Democrats refusing to take the examinations, because they will understand that if one Republican goes over the line they will stand no show.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, does the Senator think that is going to do any great harm to the public service?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I do think it is going to do great harm. If we, as Republicans, are going to pretend to the people of the country that we are going to put the Post Office Department upon a nonpartisan basis, then we ought to have the courage of our convictions and carry out an order that will do it. If, on the other hand, we are going to appoint men because they are Republicans, then we ought to be brave enough and courageous enough to say so, and do away with this farce and this flimflam of going through the theory of an examination. We ought to take one course or the other.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. We are practicing deception under this rule, I think, to pretend to the people that it is nonpartisan when it is not anything but partisanship.

Mr. SWANSON, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to state to the Senator a case in my own county. Under President Wilson's administration they held an examination. The Republican assistant postmaster stood first. He had been assistant there for years. He was efficient. He was promoted by President Wilson as a Republican. He was not confirmed, but I want to show you how the President acted. Then they put in an acting postmaster, and then held an examination. The acting postmaster had served for three or four months, and he could not stand the examination and get on the eligible list, but this Republican was first. Now, this acting postmaster has been in the service for five or six months—he had been in the service several months before and could not qualify—and they are holding him in and saying they are going to set aside this examination, and they hope he will be able to stand the second examination. I should like to ask the Senator whether that is carrying out even in a remote degree the President's order?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, the Senator knows that that is not carrying it out. Anybody who will be honest with his own conscience will say that; but, Mr. President, I do not care to go into individual cases. I do know that under the prior administration in one way or another the nonpartisanship of the selection of postmasters was to a great extent nullified. I know it from personal observation in my own State—cases where I came in personal contact with the office. I have told you about some of them this afternoon that came under my personal observation, where my colleague was the Democratic means by which a Republican who had passed the highest examination was prevented from going in. But, Mr. President, I am not willing in one breath to condemn Democrats for doing that and condone Republicans for doing the same thing under a Republican administration; and while Senators say, as has been intimated here this afternoon, that it would be a good thing to put all the Democrats out and put Republicans in, we did not get into office by making that kind of a campaign. We did not say that out in the campaign, when we were running and trying to get votes.

Mr. MOSES. I did, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator ought to have been defeated, if he did that.

Mr. MOSES. I was not. I had the largest majority ever had in New Hampshire.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator can keep on.

Mr. MOSES. I am going to.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can be a spoilsman all his life.

Mr. MOSES. I am going to.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault with him. If he went out and made that kind of a fight, then he can go on with perfect consistency and carry it out. I did not make that kind of a fight. The Democratic Party did not make that kind of a fight. The Republican Party did not make that kind of a fight. There was not anything of that kind in any of the platforms.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I want to state—and I have no quarrel with my friend from New Hampshire—that if he made that kind of a fight, the frank and manly thing to do, it seems to me—and he always does the frank and manly thing—would be to introduce a bill here to repeal the civil-service farce and say, "We are going back to the old system. If we win the election, we are going to take the offices. If the other side win the election, let them take the offices." Let us have done with the civil pension list, keeping a lot of people here until they are superannuated.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; any party that got into office on that kind of a platform would be justified in carrying out that kind of a project. I will concede their right to do it, as I concede now and always have conceded the President's right under the law to make any provision he pleases in regard to the appointment of postmasters.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator. What I have condemned is making a campaign through the country and getting into office on the theory that you are going to enforce the civil service law in spirit and in letter, and then, when you get into office, turning your back on it and turning the offices over to the victors, regardless of civil-service merit.

I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator will permit me, I will say to him that any party that will make a campaign on that plank will sweep the country. I wish to say to him, further, that I do not care what pretense others may make, and I may be repeating myself, I have said more than once on this floor, that, so far as I am concerned, I make no pretense whatever. I think the administration should be surrounded by its friends, and in view of the performance that has gone on here on the floor of the Senate during the last two days, I merely wish to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend while the Senate receives a message from the President of the United States.

[A message in writing from the President of the United States was transmitted to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. MOSES. I hope the message contains the names of a lot of good Republicans nominated for office. I want to say, further, Mr. President, apropos of the performance that has gone on here on the floor of the Senate for the last two days, because of what is described as an outrage, the "murder" of 27 officeholders, if Republican Senators eight and nine years ago had devoted their time and taken the time of the Senate in the discussion of questions of that character, there would have been no legislation whatever, because we saw the Democratic administration come in and absolutely ravage every department of the public service, and when they had filled the post offices with their own selections, then they put over them the blanket of the civil service law. They violated the civil service law after they adopted it, both in the letter and in the spirit.

I have seen a Democratic postmaster pass out of this life and out of his office, and I have seen the chairman of the Democratic State Committee appointed as an acting postmaster, and held there while he educated himself, at the expense of the Government, until he could take the examination of whatever character was then given, and of course he came out No. 1 and was appointed, the result being that the Democratic incumbency of those post offices ran not only over the eight years of the Democratic administration but two or three years more, because of the hiatus that was occasioned. I wish to say that the whole pretense here about this matter in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is absolutely futile and childish and ridiculous. We have up in New England a verb——

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not make a speech.

Mr. MOSES. I am not making a speech.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not made one yet, but I hope he will not. I yielded to the Senator to ask a question.

Mr. MOSES. I am sorry to have trespassed on the Senator's time, and I thank him for the time he has yielded to me.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not yield now.

Mr. HARRELD. I wanted to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. HARRELD. I wanted to put a question to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield after a while, but not now. I can not answer two Senators at once.

What the Senator from New Hampshire has described as happening under a Democratic administration I have been narrating, perhaps, before he came into the Chamber. I know that was going on, but that is no excuse for Republicans doing the same thing. If it is, then there will never be a reform or improvement in government, though we may live a million years. If we are going to justify crime by pointing to Democratic crime as a precedent there will be nothing but crime forever and eternally. The Senator complains of Democrats putting Republicans out, when, as a matter of fact, he stands on a platform of getting Democrats out and putting Republicans in.

Mr. MOSES. May I correct the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. He ought to praise the Democratic Party for doing that, instead of condemning them.

Mr. MOSES. May I correct the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield; I do not want to misstate anything.

Mr. MOSES. I am not complaining because Democrats put Republicans out. What I am complaining of is this childishness of the Democrats, who are now complaining because we are putting Democrats out.

Mr. NORRIS. It makes a great deal of difference whether you are putting Republicans out or whether you are putting Democrats out.

Mr. MOSES. No; we took our medicine, and I think they should take theirs.

Mr. NORRIS. No; we did not take our medicine.

Mr. MOSES. I did; I do not know about the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator had to take it sometimes, and I had to take it sometimes.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I protested against it then, and I protest against it now.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not yield now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would feel myself disqualified, after I had promised in every campaign I had ever made to be true to the Republican platform, which declared in favor of civil-service reform, if I violated the pledge after I was elected to office. A man who does not believe in it has a perfect right to condemn it, and I am not finding fault with my genial friend, the Senator from New Hampshire. He is a political spoilsman, according to his own definition. He believes in that doctrine.

Mr. MOSES. That is correct, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not going to yield to anyone for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from New Hampshire has a perfect right to take that position. He is perfectly consistent when he takes it and carries it out, and I said at the beginning that I was not against that kind of people and that kind of officials. I have no complaint to make against them. I think they are wrong. But they may be right and I wrong. At least they have a right to believe that way if they want to.

Mr. HARRELD and Mr. NELSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield? And if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma. He sought to ask me a question some time ago.

Mr. HARRELD. The Senator admits now that some fellows got into office by criminal procedure, and I want to know if the Senator thinks they ought to be confirmed in those offices and allowed to hold them?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. HARRELD. That is what I am complaining about. Now, I want to ask another question.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer that question first. Because a good many men got their offices by a violation of the law, I am not in favor of taking the mantle of the civil service law away, and saying we will put the whole thing on the political pie counter. If that is the question the Senator wants to ask——

Mr. HARRELD. No; but suppose an individual got an office in that way, should he be allowed to hold the office he secured by crooked methods?

Mr. NORRIS. No; he ought to be removed.

Mr. HARRELD. Does not the Senator know that the law of 1916 had a provision in it to the effect that appointments under that law should be made, but that the civil-service rules should not apply for two years?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRELD. And that during that time thousands and thousands of people were blanketed in under that law?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRELD. Does the Senator think they ought to be allowed to hold their offices?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I would say they ought to hold them. That was the law. They went in under the law. We made the law, and that has been the practice of every President, Democrat or Republican, who has ever issued an order extending the civil service. President Taft did the same thing; President Wilson did the same thing; President Roosevelt did the same thing. It is a common thing, after they get all the offices filled, for them to issue an order putting them under the civil service. They ought to put them under the civil service and have them filled by examination. I said so when the last order was made. I said so when President Taft made his order. I said so when President Wilson came in the second time, after he had been in office four years, and by order extended the civil service to cover the whole Post Office Department. I said then he would have been entitled to great credit if he had made the order at the beginning instead of at the end of his term, rather before he filled the offices with men of his party than afterwards. But I would rather take it then than not take it at all.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] intimated by his question that whenever that is done, the next President ought to revoke that order. Where would we get under such a practice? You would get one President in and he would fill the offices with Republicans, and after he got them filled he would issue an order extending the civil service over those offices.

Mr. HARRELD. No, Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Then a Democratic President would come in, and he would say, "These fellows came in under a false pretense," and he would revoke that order; he would fill the offices with Democrats, and when he got them all filled with Democrats he would put them again under the civil service; and so on forever, and you never would have any civil service. There is only one way to get it, if you intend to have it—when you get something put under the civil service keep it under the civil service. I thank God for every extension anybody makes, whether it puts in a Democrat or a Republican. There must be somebody in the office when the order is extended covering those offices, and Republicans can not object because the officeholders happen all to be Democrats or the Democrats because they happen to be Republicans. If that rule is carried out, then the civil service will never amount to anything. I yield now to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I may be somewhat tardy in my question, but it seems to me the Senator has departed from the discussion, and I shall be glad to hear him or some one else tell us whether the civil-service law and regulations have given us a better and more efficient service than we had before.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the question is a very proper one. Men will disagree about that. I have no hesitancy in stating where I stand. I think it has given us much more efficient Government, and it has met with many difficulties. There are a good many things done under it which are wrong. Mistakes are often made under it; there is no doubt about that. But if we should repeal the civil service law to-day and put every office in the United States on the political pie counter we would almost stop the wheels of Government. It would be almost an impossibility to carry it on.

I forgot to refer to the offices in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, about which the Senator from New Hampshire spoke. I have not said anything about them. I do not know anything about it. I hear all kinds of rumors, but I do not know why those men were removed, though I do think we ought to know. I think there ought to be publicity given to the reasons. I hope the President will tell the Congress and the country why it was done. If he does not do that, if these things are to be done in secret and covered up, then we never will get anywhere with it. Publicity is one of the greatest cures of Government evils.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Kentucky, who arose first.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I apprehend that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] fails to see, or, seeing, inadvertently misstates, the position taken upon this side by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] as well as by myself. There is very little difference of opinion between those on this side and on the other side who believe in rewarding faithful party service. I admire the candor and the nerve of the Senator from New Hampshire. I like to fight by the side of that sort of men when they are with me and to measure swords with them when they are against me. But I do not see how any honest man who believes that his party platform is binding upon him can escape from the very just condemnation of the Senator from Nebraska, and I wish to ask if either the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Nebraska holds that a man admitting his allegiance to the principles of his party, and elected upon its platform, can repudiate it:

> We renew our repeated declaration that the civil service law shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced, and extended wherever practicable. The recent action of Congress in enacting a comprehensive civil service retirement law and in working out a comprehensive employment and wage policy that will guarantee equal and just treatment to the army of Government workers, and in centralizing the administration of the new and progressive employment policy in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, is worthy of all praise.
> We condemn the present administration for its destruction of the efficiency of the Postal Service and the telegraph and telephone service when controlled by the Government, and for its failure to properly compensate employees whose expert knowledge is essential to the proper conduct of the affairs of the postal system. We commend the Republican Congress for the enactment of legislation increasing the pay of postal employees, who up to that time were the poorest paid in the Government service.

I call upon the gentleman to repudiate his own platform or to stand on it. He can not do both.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can get the same thing in the Democratic platform, running back all the way through the history of the party. It is almost a rubber-stamp proposition in both parties.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Now I am going to answer the question of the Senator from Kentucky for myself.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator would not apply his remark to that one plank only?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Kentucky connected me in his statement with the Senator from Nebraska, and I want to answer him.

Mr. NORRIS. I think, since I have the floor, I ought to have the privilege of answering first.

Mr. MOSES. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire. I agree with that platform and with that plank. I have always said so. If I did not believe in civil service, however, and had been nominated as a Republican, and had immediately in my campaign said that I did not believe in it, and concealed nothing in regard to it from my people, and had been elected, I would not feel that I was bound by the platform. The Senator from New Hampshire, running on the same platform, did not believe in it, thought civil service was a farce, and if he said to his people in his campaign that he did not believe in it, that he believed that to the victors belonged the spoils, and that he was going to get the offices for the faithful, just so they were Republicans, regardless of whether they were yellow dogs or not——

Mr. MOSES. We do not have any of that kind of Republicans in New Hampshire.

Mr. NORRIS. And was elected, then he had a perfect right, I think, to repudiate that plank in the platform. He practiced no deception. I believe in it. The party as a party has always thus gone on record and so has the Democratic Party, and both parties have always violated it.

Mr. STANLEY. Can the President repudiate it and practice no deception?

Mr. NORRIS. He could not, anyway. He did not repudiate it in the campaign, I will say that. But I am not going to answer for anybody else. I would not feel as though I could.

I yield now to the Senator from New Hampshire——

Mr. MOSES. For a reply to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; though I do not want to be interrupted by Senators who want to have a debate of their own.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Kentucky addressed a question jointly to the Senator from Nebraska and myself.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I ought to yield for that reason, and I do so.

Mr. MOSES. I want to say to the Senator from Kentucky that I stand on the plank which he has read. I base my position on that plank upon the two words "when practicable," and I believe that the application of the civil service law is practicable when we put Democrats out and put Republicans in.

Mr. NORRIS. That answer will always appeal to the politician. It will always appeal to the fellow who wants office. It will always appeal to the machine.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, does the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. I will not yield to the Senator to have a debate with the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. STANLEY. I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may ask me, but not the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. STANLEY. I mean the Senator from Nebraska. Does the Senator from Nebraska read the words "when practicable" in the platform the way the Senator from New Hampshire read it?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I do not agree with the Senator from New Hampshire on that.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator from Nebraska know anybody who understands the English language who would read it in that way except the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NORRIS. There may be others. I suppose it would depend on how badly they want an office.

Mr. STANLEY. Ordinarily the Senator from New Hampshire does not make statements that are not creditable to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, after all, no man can deny that we appealed to the people of America, and so did the Democratic Party—we have been appealing to them for 20 years—on the ground that we would enforce the civil service law, that we would extend it, and we have equally condemned the other party because they do not enforce it in good faith. When it is violated by Republicans we have Republicans standing up and saying, "That is the best thing we can do; let us violate it all the more. We ought not to have it." And yet we come back to the people with another platform and another promise that if we are elected to office we will enforce it in good faith. The Democrats have done the same thing. It is not a square deal for the people of America.

When a man comes into the Senate like my colleague did—and that is the reason why I took the floor—condemning Republicans because they are not enforcing in good faith the civil service law, I cite to him and to all like him the old common-law maxim that those who want equity must do equity; that you can not come in here and denounce us while your own hands are tarnished with the slime of deceit and corruption that you have been practicing when you were in power. That applies equally to the Republicans who are doing the same thing. My colleague complains because we Republicans are not enforcing in good faith the civil service law. I join with him in the condemnation of Republicans for not enforcing it in good faith But the charge does not come from his lips with any consistency, because they are tainted with the very crime that he charges against us.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator from Nebraska contend that both parties are equally committed to the civil service and have an equal right to claim credit for inaugurating the system?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not going into a discussion of that question. I think I could claim, and perhaps could substantiate, but I would have to look the matter up some, that the Republican Party had probably done more for it than the Democratic Party. I may be wrong about that. I am not making any claim of that kind to-day, as I should want to look it up before I asserted it.

Mr. STANLEY. The Republican Party claims to be the mother and father, the grandmother and grandfather, of civil service, and we have been denied the credit for inaugurating that system. I am not making any claim for the Democratic Party for the paternity of the institution now. I just wanted to get the attitude of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not made that kind of a charge against the Democratic Party. I will say that I think there are some things done by the Democratic Party, or by Democratic leaders, that have helped very materially in the civil service law. While I have nothing whatever in common with the late President Wilson and he has no use for me, any more than I have for him, I think, although he did some things that seemed to me were entirely wrong about it, that on the whole he did a great deal for civil service. He made a rule in regard to postmasters that I have always thought was better than the modification President Harding has made of it, and I said so to-day.

But I do not care particularly where civil service was born or who was its father or who its grandmother or what relation it has to this party or that. I am not looking for technicalities. I am not pointing them out. I am trying to talk about the practical application of the theory. While it has many things about it that sometimes result in wrong, and serious mistakes are made lots of times in its name, yet, in my judgment, it is so much better than the old spoils system that no thinking man would go back to the old system. Notwithstanding the opinion of my friend from New Hampshire, I believe that any party that would go out before the people of America and make a campaign on the theory that they were going to wipe the civil service law and rules off the books and go back to the pie-counter system would be swept out of existence with an avalanche of votes from which they would never recover.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. If agreeable to the Senator, I will yield the floor and he can proceed.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I merely wish to say to the Senator from Kentucky, if history is as I recall it, that the civil service law was written and pressed through Congress by a Democratic Senator from Ohio, George H. Pendleton. It was put into operation by a Republican President, Chester A. Arthur, and therefore, though sired by a Democrat, it has been damned by every practical man ever since.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, the Senator does not do his party credit. An examination of the platforms of the various parties will show him that the principle of civil service was advocated by Republican platforms long before Chester A. Arthur was ever inaugurated. That will come up later.

Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], notwithstanding the lucidity and force of his statement, and the Senator from Kentucky, myself, have totally failed to make themselves understood by the Senator from New Hampshire and by many of his colleagues. I am not disturbed by the firing of four or forty or four hundred Democrats. Call them all out of the service to-day and solemnly indict them for their loyalty to the principles of Jefferson, and Madison, and Jackson, and Tilden, and then stand them up against your rotten political wall and shoot them, and they will take their medicine like soldiers and like men. It is a death any Democrat may be proud to suffer. He can wear your charge and your dismissal as a badge of eternal honor, and in my country his children and his children's children will cherish his willingness to suffer in such a cause as more precious than all the honors and emoluments of office.

But that you will not, dare not, do. We are not complaining that you shoot. We are denouncing you for your infamous cowardice in shooting us in the back. Is that plain enough? You play the spoilsmen not like old Jackson or Cleveland, but like a political Pecksniff; you whine and palaver and pray and simper before long-haired men and short-haired women about your devotion to civil service——

Mr. MOSES rose.

Mr. STANLEY. Not the Senator personally, but the party which he represents, because he is a bigger man and a better man than his party.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I have seen no Pecksniffian whining at the White House about the firing of these 27 people. They were employed; they were fired; they are fired, and they are going to stay fired; and there would have been no complaint on the floor of the Senate from anyone on the other side of the Chamber if it had been done by a Democratic President.

This is a matter of opinion which I can not prove, but I hold steadfastly to the opinion that if it had been done by a Democratic President no voice would have been raised on the other side of the aisle, and, so far as I am concerned, no voice would have been raised on this side of the aisle. I would have taken my medicine. Why do you not take yours?

Mr. STANLEY. I only wish that the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] were in the White House. I only wish that your chief would dare to speak as you do. He can understand the English language, he can read and write, but he will never, in this world or in the world which is to come, O. K. what either one of you have said.

I am not condemning the action of the Senator from New Hampshire; I am not condemning the action of the Senator from Indiana—brave, clean, fearless spoilsmen. I am condemning the action of him who says that he does it for the good of the service if he does it for the good of his party.

Mr. MOSES. I think that is good doctrine, Mr. President.

Mr. STANLEY. These Democrats are not complaining that they have lost their places. They are not complaining of the pecuniary loss. Under a civil service honestly administered no man can be deprived of his place except for unworthiness, inefficiency, or moral turpitude. He is either incompetent, corrupt, or indecent, or he is entitled to stay. Every man and every woman who goes out under this shadow is stamped as corrupt, incompetent, or indecent. Wipe out the stain. Charge us with being Democrats and we will wear your charge like a halo, a badge of distinction to be coveted and treasured, and you will hear no complaint from the Senator from Kentucky or any of his ilk. But fire us like men! Let us out like men! Come out and fire us, and quit this sniping from the rear, under the flimsy pretense of civil service, which the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Indiana have the decency to disown, and I commend your example to the other end of the Avenue.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of the United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I believe we are now ready to proceed with the consideration of the bill which is the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as the Chair has stated, the pending question is on the amendment which I have offered to the amendment in the nature of a substitute which has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the bill as it came from the other House. My amendment, if agreed to, would provide an additional judge for the southern district of Florida. I desire to submit a few observations on that question, and to show, if I may, the actual situation in the southern district of Florida and the need for the additional judge provided for in my amendment. I propose to analyze the tables which are attached to the report of the committee, and I am quite sure I will be able to show that there is not a district in the whole list for which 19 judges are to be created where the need is so great, where the claim is so just, and the merit so pronounced as in the southern district of Florida.

Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senate, first, to this fact: I introduced in the Senate in 1917, as I recall, a bill which provided for an additional judge for the southern district of Florida. The bill passed the Senate, went to the other House, was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House, was reported favorably there, and went on the calendar. It was, however, never reached; and, therefore, never passed the House. In 1919 I introduced a similar bill here; that bill was reported out of the Judiciary Committee favorably; it passed the Senate, went to the House, was referred to the Judiciary Committee, again reported favorably there, and placed on the calendar; but, unfortunately, on account of the immense amount of business accumulated in that body, the calendar was not reached and the bill was never passed in the House.

The House passed the pending bill providing for 22 additional judges. Included in that bill was one judge for the southern district of Florida. That bill came to the Senate and was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and now that committee has reported back a substitute providing for 19 judges and entirely omitting the judge for the southern district of Florida. So we are in this position: The Senate having on two different occasions and in two different Congresses passed a bill providing for an additional judge for the southern district of Florida, which received the favorable action of the Judiciary Committee of the other House and went on the calendar there, but because of the pressure of business and the lack of time was not reached, at last the House having taken up the subject and included this additional judge in the bill which they passed, when that bill comes to the Senate the Senate reverses its action taken twice deliberately heretofore and strikes out the provision for the additional judge for the southern district of Florida. In doing that the committee acts very strangely, because the conditions have not improved in the southern district of Florida; the congestion continues there; it is greater now than it ever was; the table which the committee attaches to its report shows pending in that court 1,336 cases on June 30, 1921, whereas, according to the hearings before the House committee, the actual number of cases pending and undisposed of in that district to-day is 1,633. Such a condition practically amounts, in considerable degree, to a denial of justice to litigants.

We have in the southern district of Florida one of the best-qualified judges on the Federal bench in this country, a man who has had some 30 years' experience as a circuit court judge in that State and as a Federal judge for the past 10 years. He is overworked, he gets no vacation, he devotes himself entirely to his duties there; but it is simply impossible for any one man to accomplish all that is required to be accomplished in order that litigants may have justice in that district. The cases are increasing all the while; the congestion continues; the conditions, as I have stated, have grown worse year after year; and yet, in spite of the action of the Senate in 1917 and again in 1919, now, in this year, we are asked to decide that we will leave out the southern district of Florida and grant no relief whatever to that district. It is not fair. If the conditions had improved, if circumstances had changed so that litigants could have their business disposed of with reasonable dispatch, then there would have been some reason and some sort of excuse or justification for this action by the committee; but, on the contrary, as I have stated, the conditions have grown worse, the congestion has increased. Now, in spite of the laborious efforts of the sitting judge and in spite of the help that may be sent to him from time to time—and judges have been sent into that district to assist—in spite of all that, it has almost reached the point where it is scarcely worth while to go into the Federal court. We are almost in as bad a situation as are the people of Borneo, where, I believe, when one person sues another the custom requires that the litigants shall each put a live clam into a bowl of lime water, and the owner of the clam which winces first or keels over first loses; or parties in court are much like the contestants in these days of modern war, the nation that wins the war loses.

Now, Mr. President, let me analyze the tables, which, as I have said, are attached to the report of the Senate committee showing the business pending in all the district courts of the United States on June 30, 1921. As I have heretofore stated, the House hearings show that in the southern district of Florida there are 1,633 cases pending instead of 1,336 as indicated by the tables; but I will deal with the tables as I find them here.

Beginning with Massachusetts, the following is the situation: At this time Massachusetts has one district and one judge. The Senate Committee on the Judiciary proposes to add two more judges. The table shows the number of cases pending on June 30, 1921, in Massachusetts, as follows:

United States civil	206
Criminal, including prohibition	286
Admiralty	142
All other civil cases	923
Total	1,457

It is true there are bankruptcy cases pending to the number of 1,434 and draft cases to the number of 3,943, and prohibition cases amount to 68. Bankruptcy and draft cases, however, need not require a great deal of time or labor on the part of the judge, and we may for the present lay them to one side.

Compare the figures which I have given of the business pending in Massachusetts with the situation in the southern district of Florida. We find that the southern district of Florida has one judge and there are pending and undisposed of, according to the tables attached to the Judiciary Committee report—

United States civil	250
Criminal, including prohibition	594
Admiralty	165
All other civil cases	327
Total	1,336

As I have said, the House hearings show that there are to-day pending 1,633 cases in the southern district of Florida.

There are also 235 bankruptcy cases pending there, 18 draft cases, and the prohibition cases number 247. So there are as many civil cases pending, less 44, in the court of the southern district of Florida as are pending in Massachusetts; and yet it is proposed to give to Massachusetts two judges and deny the southern district of Florida one additional judge.

In the southern district of Florida there are considerably more than three times as many criminal cases pending as are pending in the Massachusetts district; there are 23 more admiralty cases than are pending in the Massachusetts court and there are more than one-third as many other cases as in the Massachusetts district. The total number of cases in the southern district of Florida, 1,336, according to the committee's table, compares with a total in Massachusetts of 1,357. Yet the committee proposes, as I have said, to give Massachusetts two additional judges and denies any relief whatever to the southern district of Florida.

Take New York: The committee proposes to provide an additional judge for the eastern district of New York and two additional judges for the southern district of New York. There are at present four districts in New York, with nine judges, and it is proposed to give New York three more judges. To be sure, there is a certain amount of congestion in the eastern and southern districts of New York, but it will be observed that in the northern and western districts—the northern district now having two judges and the western district one judge—there are pending in the northern district 1,251 cases and in the western district 855 cases, or a total for the two districts of 2,092 cases, where they have three judges, against a total of 1,336—which should be, really, 1,633—cases in the southern district of Florida, where there is only one judge.

It is argued that the northern district of Florida has pending only a total number of cases of 209, and that the judge of that district could assist in the southern district. Why can not three judges in the northern and western districts of New York, with the amount of business shown by the table, assist in the eastern and southern districts of New York? In the northern and western districts of New York we find three judges handling a little more business than the one judge has to attend to in the southern district of Florida, and yet the committee proposes to provide three additional judges in New York, one for the eastern and two for the southern district.

Take Pennsylvania. Coming to Pennsylvania, they have now in the eastern district two judges. The total number of cases pending in that district is 2,788. This is a little over twice the business in a district where they have two judges that there is in the southern district of Florida, where there is only one. The committee proposes to give the eastern district another judge.

In the western district of Pennsylvania the total number of cases is 2,449, and they have two judges now. This is less than twice the number of cases that are pending in the southern district of Florida. They have, however, two judges to attend to them. The committee proposes to add another judge there, making three, but does not recommend another judge for the southern district of Florida.

Take Texas. The northern district of Texas shows pending 140 civil cases, 557 criminal cases, no admiralty cases, and 523 of all other civil cases; total, 1,220. They have two judges in that district. The committee proposes to give them one more.

Think of that! In that district, with only 1,220 cases pending, as against 1,336 in the southern district of Florida, they have two judges now and we have one, and the committee proposes to give them another judge.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Florida is informed with regard to the situation in the northern district of Texas. The committee was advised that one of the judges in the northern district of Texas had been disabled by illness for quite a while, and probably would not be able soon to do all the work that a well man might be expected to do. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is here. He knows whether or not that is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not mean to criticize this allowance to Texas. That is not my purpose at all. I am showing the discrimination. I am simply pointing out a comparison of the situation in the districts; and I say I am not arguing but that Texas is entitled to this judge. I am simply saying that if Texas, where at present they have two judges in this district, with only 1,220 cases pending, is entitled to another judge, the southern district of Florida, where there are 1,336 cases pending, certainly ought to have an additional judge.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is the Senator arguing not only that there is discrimination but that there is not a need of these judges in these various districts?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I am not arguing that there is not need. I will touch on that point a little later. I am simply comparing the business in these courts with the business in the southern district of Florida. I am not contending but that the need is as the committee found; but if the need is there in the cases where they have allowed the judge, the need is certainly plain and clear in the southern district of Florida.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think I understand the point which the Senator is raising, and I rather sympathize with it in view of the statistics which he has read; but I understood the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to argue strenuously that there is not need of these additional judges. Am I correct in that?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is so, and I think I shall be able to demonstrate it.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Tennessee may take that position, but I am not arguing that at all.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the contention of the Senator from Florida is that there is a need of more judges, but that the allotment has not been made without discrimination?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. I contend that if there is any case anywhere in this whole list where it is clear that an additional judge should be provided, that case is the southern district of Florida; but, at any rate, whether it is the plainest, clearest case or not, it certainly is one case where this remedy ought to be applied. The business in that district—I am speaking now with reference to the northern district of Texas—does not approach the amount of business in the southern district of Florida, where there is only one judge, and yet they already have two in the northern district of Texas, and the committee proposes to add another.

I will admit that the number of cases is not a conclusive test. The character of the cases ought to be considered. Among the important cases in the jurisdiction of these courts are the admiralty cases. These require much time, careful consideration, and a great deal of labor. The admiralty cases pending in the southern district of Florida are 165. It will undoubtedly require much more time and labor to dispose of these cases than it would to dispose of three times the number of criminal cases or bankruptcy cases. There are no admiralty cases in the northern district of Texas. If there were only one judge in that district there might be some reason for adding another. Even then there would not be the need that there is in the southern district of Florida; but there are two judges there, and the committee proposes to give another, and omit a judge for the southern district of Florida.

Take Michigan: There are two districts and two judges in Michigan. The committee proposes to add one in the eastern district of Michigan. The table shows that in that district the pending business is, civil cases 109, criminal cases 378, admiralty cases 16, all other civil cases 251; total, 754. There is not one-half the business congested and pending in that court that there is in the southern district of Florida, and yet the committee proposes to add a judge in Michigan and refuses to add one for the southern district of Florida.

Take Ohio: There are two districts and four judges now. In the northern district, where they have two judges, there are pending civil cases 155, criminal cases 579, admiralty cases 21, other cases 656; total, 1,411. The business in that district is not as great as the business in the southern district of Florida. They already have two judges to attend to it, and the committee proposes to add another.

There are only 21 admiralty cases pending in that district, whereas in the southern district of Florida there are 165. The United States civil cases are 94 less in that district than in the southern district of Florida. There are two judges to take care of that business now. There is one judge to take care of the business in the southern district of Florida. The committee proposes to give the northern district of Ohio another judge.

Take Illinois: There are three districts in Illinois and four judges. There is a great deal of business in the northern district—not twice as much as in the southern district of Florida—but they have two judges now. The committee proposes to add another. The pending United States civil cases are 229, as against 250 in Florida. The criminal cases, including prohibition, are 1,092, as against 594 in Florida. The admiralty cases are 10 in the northern district of Illinois, as against 165 in the southern district of Florida. The total number of cases in the northern district of Illinois are 2,184, as against 1,336, according to this table—really, 1,633—in Florida. They have two judges in the northern district of Illinois to take care of that business. They have one in Florida. The committee proposes to add another in Illinois, and refuses any relief in Florida.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator doubtless has also observed that the seventh circuit has, I believe, either four or five circuit judges. It has only three States in it—Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin—and in all of them except Illinois the business is light. Two of those circuit judges live in the city of Chicago, which is the chief point of the northern district, and assist in the district courts there.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am much obliged to the Senator for mentioning that. It had for the moment escaped me. It only shows that the supply of judges there is very considerable. Certainly if they need another one, that need is not as great as in the southern district of Florida.

Now, take Minnesota. Minnesota has one district and two judges. There are pending, United States civil cases, 399; criminal cases, including prohibition, 382; admiralty cases, 29; all other civil cases, 1,130; total, 1,940, with two judges to attend to the business.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida further yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is here, and I have noticed that there are in his State a thousand and some civil cases other than those in which the United States is interested. I am very curious to know the nature of those cases. It looks to me as though it must be a class of cases involving one question. Can the Senator inform us what those cases are—something over a thousand civil cases in Minnesota in which the United States is not interested?

Mr. NELSON. Minnesota, with two and a half million people, is only one district, and we have two judges, and for a long series of years we have had to have outside judges to help them. Judge Amidon, of North Dakota, before he became disabled, spent more of his time in Minnesota in helping our judges than any other judge.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am curious to know the character of those cases.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator means those in which the Government is not interested?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. They are mostly of a commercial character. St. Paul and Minneapolis, the two cities having a population of over 600,000, constitute a great railroad center—outside of Chicago, perhaps the greatest railroad center in the West. Then we have Duluth, a city of about 100,000 people, up on Lake Superior. There probably are more vessels coming into that port than any other port of the United States outside of New York, because the number of ships that pass through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal is far greater than the number of vessels that pass through the Suez Canal. Then we have in the Duluth country the greatest iron mines in America. Minnesota produces, perhaps, 70 per cent of all the iron ore in the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not want to interrupt the Senator from Florida too much. I thought perhaps that was a class of cases like we find in some of the Western States, growing out of some particular matter.

Mr. NELSON. No; it is the general commercial business there.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say, if the Senator will allow me, that St. Paul and Minneapolis are the great jobbing towns for all that northwestern country, and they do a tremendous amount of business. Minneapolis is the great milling center of the country, and produces more flour than any other city in America.

I shall not take up the time of the Senator from Florida any further.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am taking up these States in the order in which they appear in the bill. I am not picking out any particular State nor any particular district. I am taking them up in the order in which they appear, and this is one instance where they have allowed an additional judge. I grant all that my good friend has said about the great State of Minnesota. It is a magnificent State. They have great enterprises there, and an enormous amount of business, undoubtedly, in those two great cities, and in Duluth also. As to the number of admiralty cases, however, there are only 29 appearing on this list.

They have, as he has said, two judges now. There is one district in the whole State, and the number of cases pending is 1,940, according to this list. The committee proposes to add another judge, and that would mean about one-half the amount of business for each judge that the judge of the southern district of Florida has before him. There are only 29 admiralty cases pending there, as I have said, as against 165 in the southern district of Florida. There are only 382 criminal cases pending there, as against 594 in the southern district of Florida. There are two judges, and the committee proposes to give them another, but denies any relief to the southern district of Florida.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us about how long these cases have been pending? Is there any great congestion?

Mr. FLETCHER. Some of them have been pending for two years or more. I have communications from attorneys to that effect. They are not all recently docketed cases. A great many of them have been pending a year and a half or two years; some longer than that.

Mr. DIAL. If they would put on more steam it may be that they could get rid of some of them.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is more business there than any man, no matter how well qualified he may be, and no matter how vigorous and strong he may be, can attend to.

Mr. DIAL. I was not referring to Florida alone, but to all the districts.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps there is something in that suggestion, but as to this condition in the southern district of Florida, it is utterly impossible for any one man to keep up with that business.

Let us take Missouri next: There are two districts in that State and two judges. In the eastern district there are pending, United States civil cases, 46; criminal cases, including prohibition, 257; admiralty cases, 3; all other civil cases, 316; total, 622. They have one judge. The committee proposes to give an additional judge. With 622 cases on their docket undisposed of, the committee proposes to give them another judge, while the southern district of Florida has 1,633 cases undisposed of on the docket, and they deny an additional judge.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a suggestion. The Senator is using the figures 1,633 as applied to the total number of cases.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will confine it to 1,336.

Mr. CUMMINS. In order to be comparative, the Senator would have to treat the number pending as of June 30, 1921.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is correct. I should call that figure 1,336 as the total shown, but I am merely saying that really the fact is that to-day there are some 1,633 cases pending.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt the other districts would show a like increase.

Mr. FLETCHER. They might show a similar increase, that is true; so I will say that the comparison would be as between 622 cases pending in that court in Missouri and 1,336 pending in the southern district of Florida.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, has any Senator thus far suggested that one judge ought to be able to take care of that large docket in Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not heard of it. I only know that they have stricken out the provision in the bill as it passed the House which gave this additional judge to that district. I can not understand why. I think my good friend from Minnesota has some suggestion to offer. Perhaps he thinks Florida ought to be treated something like Minnesota, the whole State put in one district, and two judges appointed for the one district. We now have a northern and southern district, with a judge in each district; but that would not remedy the situation. I will deal with that a little later.

Just compare the business in that district in Missouri with the business in the southern district of Florida. For instance, of United States civil cases there are 46 in the eastern district of Missouri, as against 250 in the southern district of Florida. Of criminal cases, there are 251 in the eastern district of Missouri, as against 594 in the southern district of Florida. Of admiralty cases, in Missouri there are 3, as against 165 in Florida. Of all other cases, there are 316 in Missouri, as against 327 in Florida.

The total in the Missouri district is 622, as against 1,336 in the southern district of Florida. Yet the eastern district of Missouri is to have an additional judge, and the southern district of Florida is denied one. The total number of cases pending in both districts of Missouri, with two judges, is only 1,137, as against 1,336 in the southern district of Florida, with one judge.

Let us turn to Oklahoma. In the eastern district of Oklahoma the table shows that there are pending United States civil cases 233, as against 250 in the southern district of Florida. Criminal cases, including prohibition, 764, as against 594 in the southern district of Florida. Admiralty cases none, as against 165 in the southern district of Florida. All other civil cases in the eastern district of Oklahoma 394, as against 327 in the southern district of Florida. Total in the eastern district of Oklahoma, 1,399, as against 1,336 in the southern district of Florida. Yet, with admiralty cases entirely eliminated and with civil cases less in number, the committee proposes to add another judge for the eastern district of Oklahoma, and denies consideration to the southern district of Florida.

Let us take Montana. Montana has one district and one judge. The cases pending are: Civil cases, 81, as against 250 in the southern district of Florida; criminal cases, including prohibition, 309, as against 594 in the southern district of Florida; admiralty cases, none, as against 165 in the southern district of Florida; all other cases, 135, as against 327 in the southern district of Florida. Total, 525 in Montana, as against 1,336 in the southern district of Florida. The committee proposes to give an additional judge to take care of this business in Montana, and denies relief to the southern district of Florida.

California now has two districts and four judges. The committee proposes to add one judge in the northern district and one in the southern district, giving them six judges in their two districts.

Take the latter district, which now has two judges. There are pending, United States civil cases, 129, as against 250 in the southern district of Florida. Criminal cases, including prohibition, 538, as against 594 in the southern district of Florida. Admiralty cases, 22, as against 165 in the southern district of Florida. All other cases, 490, as against 327 in the southern district of Florida. Total, 1,179 in that district of California as against 1,336 in the southern district of Florida. Yet the committee proposes to add one judge to that district in California, where they already have two, and denies any relief to Florida.

Mr. KING. Are these instances to which the Senator is calling our attention evidences of mistakes, or of unwarranted discrimination?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will have to leave the Senator to draw his own conclusion.

Mr. KING. Of course, I am opposed to the Senator from Florida getting an extra judge, and I am opposed to the whole bill. I wanted to say that to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. That does not give me very much comfort. I am giving the total number of cases as furnished by the committee, and the amount of business pending, as shown by the committee's report. These figures unquestionably demonstrate that they are allowing judges in districts where the amount of business nowhere approaches the business in the southern district of Florida. Why they have done that I leave for the Senator to reason out.

Mr. KING. Of course, it must be a mistake.

Mr. FLETCHER. It occurs to me that it is a mistake.

Mr. KING. I think we ought to recommit the bill with instructions to correct these mistakes and report a bill perhaps providing for four or five judges altogether.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there is a real need for judges in a number of these districts.

Mr. SHIELDS. There might be need for an additional judge in four or five districts in the United States, but not 25 or 30, as is proposed in this bill. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to one very instructive thing about the figures which the Senator from Florida is presenting. It shows the standard the committee set when they struck out of the bill the additional judge which the House of Representatives gave to Florida. Although there was that amount of business, it was not thought that on account of its docket it needed a new judge. That was the standard they set as to that, and they set a similar standard in Tennessee by striking out the provision for the judge which the House had granted Tennessee. And yet, although they set that standard, they went along and allowed about a dozen judges in districts where they did not have nearly as much business as the southern district of Florida had, and they provided for additional judges in six or eight districts where they did not have nearly as much business as the court in Tennessee had.

Mr. KING. I think the first standard was right, and if they had adhered to it, I would have been entirely satisfied.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would it not be well for the Senator from Utah to defer final judgment until he hears some of the considerations, at any rate, which led to the exclusion of the southern district of Florida?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think perhaps that inquiry of the Senator is quite proper, although, may I say to the Senator, I listened with great pleasure to the instructive and able address of the Senator from Iowa, as I always listen to his addresses, and I say to the Senator now, and I do not want him to regard it as flattery, that there is no man in the Senate I regard with higher favor and friendship than he, and there is no man more honest in his legislative work than the Senator from Iowa. I listened to all he said in defense of this bill, and I have listened to the admirable address of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and I am rereading it, as I am rereading the speech of the Senator from Iowa, and I shall vote on this bill in the light of what I have heard and what I shall hear in the future.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will allow me, I am not speaking of the Senator's ultimate judgment with regard to the merit of the proposition to add to our judicial force. I have said everything I have to say upon that subject. But the Senator from Utah seemed to be drifting to the conclusion that the committee had been guilty of some kind of discrimination——

Mr. KING. That they had made a mistake.

Mr. CUMMINS. Either intentional or otherwise, in the distribution that is proposed to be made of the additional judicial force. There is something to be said in favor of this distribution. It does not suit me entirely, because I was overruled more than once in the committee; but there are reasons which ought to be heard relative to the exclusion of the southern district of Florida from this distribution.

Mr. KING. I stated to the Senator from Florida that I was against his proposition, so the Senator from Iowa ought to be satisfied with my attitude.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Utah spoke of recommitting this bill for the purpose of bringing in districts where additional judges were needed, rather than to have a general bill like this.

Mr. KING. Somewhat of a pork-barrel bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; something in the nature of a pork-barrel bill. Would it not be better and wiser to let the bills the Senate has already passed, among them a bill providing for a new judge for Florida, be acted on by the House of Representatives, to let each district stand on its own bottom, rather than for us to put in a lot of bills in this pork-barrel fashion. We have provided, where we conceive it is necessary, to meet this so-called emergency by this bill. Let a Senator introduce a bill for his State, and let us take up each bill on its merits.

Mr. KING. I want none for my State, I assure the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. But would not that be wiser than a general bill like this?

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I must be allowed to interrupt a moment more. The suggestion of a pork barrel is one that ought to be taken, I think, in a Pickwickian sense. So far as I know there is no such motive in the mind of any Senator. I take it that the Senator from North Carolina will vote his real conviction upon the subject. I take it the Senator from Florida will do likewise, and the Senator from Utah has assured us that he will. I would like to know what Senators are to be induced to vote for the bill upon consideration that somebody else will vote for the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. It has every earmark of a pork-barrel bill. It starts in to create 19 new judges in 19 States, and that means 38 votes to start with. Is not that a pork-barrel bill? That is my idea of a pork-barrel bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has a very low conception of the honor and integrity of his brother Senators. I am sorry they have fallen so low in his estimation.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows what a pork-barrel bill means.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not.

Mr. OVERMAN. He has been here and heard them called pork-barrel bills before.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know what it is——

Mr. OVERMAN (interposing). His former colleague knows.

Mr. CUMMINS. Except that it is stated sometimes that they trade votes, and a Senator votes for a thing he does not believe in, in order to get somebody else to vote for a thing that he does believe in. Is that going to happen in connection with this bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. When we make 19 new judges we are apt to find 38 members of the Senate voting for them, and that looks a little like pork to me.

Mr. CUMMINS. While I was not in favor of the plan—I was in favor of the plan of appointing two judges in each circuit—the Senator from North Carolina was more influential than anybody else in the committee in changing that plan into something else, although I know that he does not want to add any judges to the already large judicial force.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; and I voted against the bill in the subcommittee and in the committee, taking the ground that it was unwise legislation, unusual legislation, and all wrong, as I expect to show later on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I did not frame the bill, and I am dealing with it as I find it. If we pursued the course indicated by the Senator from North Carolina, I would not have any fears about an additional judge for the southern district of Florida, because we have twice passed a bill in the Senate providing for such additional judge.

Mr. OVERMAN. I voted for such a bill twice in the Senate, and it is in the House now, where it sleeps. Instead of passing that bill as they ought to have done they sent to us this pork-barrel bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. They did not reach it. The committee, as I stated before, reported out favorably both bills on different occasions, and they were on the calendar, but the House had to adjourn before they reached that item on the calendar. The House finally did put that provision in the pending bill, and the bill came over to the Senate providing for an additional judge for the southern district of Florida. So that substantially both Houses of Congress have declared in favor of an additional judge for the southern district of Florida, but now the bill comes here and the Senate committee sees fit to strike out the provision for an additional judge for the southern district of Florida, thus reversing the action they had twice before taken—in 1917 and 1919—and then when the House agrees with them they will not agree with the House.

Referring again to the item about the condition in California, the committee proposes to add one judge for that district when they already had two and denies any relief in Florida.

Dividing the number of cases by 3, you will have 393 cases in the southern district of California pending before each judge as against 1,336 cases before the judge in the southern district of Florida.

The situation is somewhat similar in the northern district of California where they already have two judges.

Now, let us consider Arizona. I have heretofore favored the bill that was passed by the Senate providing for an additional judge in Arizona. At that time the separate bill providing for the additional judge for Florida was also passed. Now, Arizona is given an additional judge by the provisions of the pending bill.

Arizona has one district and one judge. There are pending in Arizona:

United States civil cases, 16, as against 250 in southern district of Florida.
Criminal cases, including prohibition, 122, as against 594 in southern district of Florida.
Admiralty cases, 0, as against 165 in southern district of Florida.
All other civil cases, 160, as against 327 in southern district of Florida.
Total cases, 310, as against 1,336 in southern district of Florida.

The committee proposes to give Arizona one more judge and denies to the southern district of Florida any relief.

I submit that there is not an instance or district in this whole table and provided for in this bill that has claims for an additional judge equal in merit to the claims of the southern district of Florida.

And now I come—and I am sorry the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is not present—to the only arguments I know of ever having been proposed against the amendment or for any opposition to an additional judge for the southern district of Florida. One is that the northern district of Florida is practically without any congestion, that the business in the northern district of Florida is not even sufficient to occupy the whole time of the judge in that district, and therefore it is argued that the judge in the northern district of Florida ought to be sent down to the southern district of Florida to help out. That has been done from time to time and is being done from time to time. Judges from other districts, from Alabama, for instance, have been sent to the southern district of Florida, but that does not meet the situation.

In the first place, it is no economy to do that, because when a judge goes out of his own district into another district he is allowed $10 a day for his subsistence, and there are other expenses which he is allowed, so that we are not saving any money by sending judges from outside districts into the district where the time required to keep up with the business would be so great as in the southern district of Florida.

The other argument is that we make the whole State of Florida into one district and thereby we would have two judges in the one district. In that case we would have one clerk with an office located somewhere, say in Jacksonville, and he would have 10 different offices, because we have 10 different places for holding court in the two districts, 10 different deputies or assistants, and 10 different officers conducting business throughout the State, with headquarters for all the papers and all the files in the chief office, and that would be very inconvenient to litigants.

Florida is peculiarly situated. From Key West to Tallahassee is just about as far as from Jacksonville to Washington. It is 900 miles from Key West, the extreme southern end of the State, to Pensacola, on the western end of the State. The only way to reach those two extremes is by rail, proceeding from Key West north to Jacksonville and then due west to Pensacola. There is no way of shortening the distance. That would not relieve the situation and it would not be economical. We would not accomplish any relief practically at all by making the whole State into one district and reassigning the judges who are there now in the northern and the southern districts.

It is true that the northern district of Florida has not an overburdensome amount of business, and the judge of that district does help in the southern district and elsewhere throughout the country. He is frequently sent to New York and other States. That practice would continue even if Florida is allowed an additional judge. It would still be necessary to have the help of the judge of the northern district. There is more work in the southern district of Florida than two judges can do, and they would need the assistance of the judge from the northern district for as much time as he could spare if an additional judge is granted.

Right in the face of the previous action of the Senate and the recent action of the House this injustice is proposed to be done the southern district of Florida.

The tables which I have quoted show the rankest discrimination in the proposals of the committee.

No matter what the situation or conditions may be in other States, and let it be understood that I am not criticizing the judgment of the committee with respect to the necessity for additional judges elsewhere, but I am much better informed with reference to the true situation and condition in Florida than the committee, having practiced law there for 30 years before coming to the Senate and being constantly in touch with attorneys and litigants. I say to you, Senators, and in all candor, that it would be a great wrong and an inexcusable blunder for you to refuse to adopt the amendment which I have proposed, providing for an additional judge for the southern district of Florida.

The situation as given in statements to me by those who know and as I have personal knowledge of in the southern district of Florida, and in fact in the entire State of Florida, is peculiar, more peculiar than that of any other State or district in the country, and for that reason its condition can not be compared with that of any other district or State, because there is no other part of the country having a situation or surroundings comparable with Florida.

The shape of the State, its geographical location, its coast line of practically 1,200 miles, and the directions of its lines of transportation all emphasize its peculiarities.

The five largest cities in the State in and around which litigation arises and is tried are: Jacksonville in the northeast corner, Pensacola in the northwest corner, Miami in the southeast corner, Key West at its southern extremity, and Tampa on its west coast. Pensacola is 400 miles west of Jacksonville, Miami is 335 miles south of Jacksonville, and Key West is 500 miles south of Jacksonville. Tampa is more than 200 miles from Jacksonville and 240 miles from Key West by steamer. By the necessary lines of transportation Pensacola is as far from Key West as New York is from Chicago or Tampa is from Washington. Tampa is just 24 hours from Pensacola and Key West is 36 hours from Pensacola.

Florida has a coast line of about 1,200 miles, indented with bays and harbors, most of them shallow, but in which small boats may land, and since the enactment of the prohibition amendment and the Volstead Act it is the mecca of violators of that law. Its proximity to the English isle, and within 40 miles, on the east, of Bemini, and Cuba within 100 miles on the south, offer peculiar inducements of easy access to the United States by bootleggers, smugglers, and those who wish to violate the immigration laws.

In this connection I call attention to the headlines of a copyrighted article which appeared in the New York Herald and in the Tampa Times of February 13, 1922, showing the tremendous opportunities and the advantage taken of them by violators of the Federal laws. The headlines are:

Is Florida open door to Chinks?
Large scale smuggling of orientals is charged.
Vessels slip in from Cuba.
Tampa and west coast ports places of entry.

Another headline reads:

Five hundred orientals smuggled in, officials say.
Five thousand more wait in Cuba for entrance into United States.

That is one kind of business which does not have to be considered in some other districts. I wish to call attention also to an article from the Miami Herald of March 31, 1922. I will just read from the headlines:

Ten Chinese, shipped from Cuba, seized on cruiser in bay.
Coast Guard cutter, in command of Captain Miller, nips alleged smuggling plot; surprises ship.
Crew of three taken.
Sixty-year-old oriental rolls out of compartment during search for liquor; guns bring others forth.

So there is the immigration problem and also the smuggling problem with which we have to deal in the southern district of Florida. All of these violations and attempts at violations are matters within the sole jurisdiction of the Federal courts. These conditions exist and will continue to exist for years, and make a large and constantly increasing amount of business in the Federal court and are getting more and more burdensome, and some relief must be granted if the business of the courts in Florida, and especially in the southern district, is to be taken care of in any way approximating satisfaction.

The question is how to properly take care of them.

The lawyers practicing in the southern district who have business in the Federal court are practically unanimous in the belief that the only solution is an additional judge for the southern district, and there are many reasons why they are justified in this belief.

In the first place, an important item is the comparative expense to the Government in the handling of the business—whether the Government could more economically handle its business by the assignment or the appointment of an additional judge. If handled through the medium of the assignment of another judge, even from the same State, the expense would be a considerable item and might cost the Government for traveling expenses and per diem approximately the salary of an extra judge.

As the court now sits most of the time in Jacksonville, and only holds stated terms in other places—in Key West twice a year and once a year each in Ocala, Tampa, Fernandina, and Miami—with but one judge, who has in Jacksonville enough to occupy his time and properly feels that unless cases are ready for trial at these stated terms he should get back to Jacksonville as soon as possible, unless criminal cases are promptly ready for trial, and they frequently are not, they are continued, with the resultant expenses to the Government for witness fees, marshal's costs, and other costs incident thereto. This frequently results in either the failure or delay in the Government realizing upon fines which, if cases were promptly tried, would be immediately imposed and collected, but if not properly tried, convictions, on account of the loss of witnesses and other accidents, might not be secured, or if secured afterwards the chances of collecting the fines in money would be largely decreased.

Every time the judge of the northern district, or any other district, would leave the place of his residence to attend court in another part of the State he would, depending on where he went, have to travel from 500 to 1,000 miles. In addition to his transportation, there would be his per diem for expenses, so that, viewing it from an economical standpoint for the Government cases alone, it seems that it would probably be cheaper for the Government to pay the salary of an additional judge than to incur these expenses and run the risks of loss and delays in the trial of criminal cases. Right here it is not inappropriate to say that the enforcement of the Volstead Act and other criminal statutes will be greatly assisted by prompt trials and convictions, and all delays in such matters only make more trouble for the Government.

In addition to a judge coming into this district from his own, he would be expected also to take care of the business in his district; and if the judge of the northern district is selected to do this work, he would, if he properly takes care of his own district, have to make frequent trips there to do so, or he would allow the business in his district to suffer from want of attention, thus duplicating in his district the unsatisfactory expenses and burdensome conditions which exist in this one. With the large and increasing amount of business in the district and the docket so far behind, as it now is, there being about 1,600 cases undisposed of at present, periodical visits of judges can not properly take care of the business.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the basis for the argument for the creation of an additional judge in Montana and Arizona was the long distances which it is necessary to travel in those States. I think the record will show that in the district court in Arizona only 131 cases are undisposed of. I am astonished to learn, from what the Senator from Florida has said, of the great distances which must be traveled by the judges in Florida. They seem to be as great as the distances which have to be traveled by judges in Arizona and Montana.

Mr. FLETCHER. The argument in reference to the great distances to be traveled by the judges in those States applies with equal force to Florida; and, in addition to that, the enormous amount of business in Florida is also to be considered.

In addition to the question of economy in handling the business, Congress, among other things, should consider the expense and costs to litigants in civil cases and the expedition of business. Under present conditions, as Florida is a common-law State, and many questions of practice and procedure arise to be determined before a case is at issue, I call this matter especially to the attention of lawyers, because it is one which is very important to be considered, that Florida, being a common-law State, the settlement of the pleadings must be attended to before the trial may be begun, the cost to litigants of having their attorneys reach the judge to settle necessary matters of pleadings is unduly burdensome, as trips by lawyers of 200 to 500 miles for that purpose, with the necessary expenses and compensation for the time taken to make such trips, is now only justified where the amount involved is large; otherwise litigants have to wait for months, until the judge gets to the division where the action is pending, and thousands of dollars of costs to litigants now expended would be saved if there was an additional judge located at some other convenient place in the southern district and the civil business greatly expedited.

It is admitted that the docket in the southern district needs relief, as there are practically 1,600 untried cases; but the mere number of cases does not, without a more intimate knowledge, disclose the true situation. On account of its coast lines and harbors and shipping there is a large amount of admiralty business in the district—much larger in proportion, probably, than most other districts. These cases frequently involve small amounts, and as the judge is required in litigated cases of this character to hear the testimony, it not only takes up a large portion of the time of the court but in small cases, where they are pending away from the residence of the judge, the delays in hearings frequently are such as to amount almost to a denial of justice.

In addition to all this, it is certain that the business in this district in the immediate future will be sufficient to keep two judges occupied. The southern portion of the State is rapidly increasing in population, more so than the western portion, and developing its resources in every way. Large amounts of capital from other States are being invested in enterprises of all kinds. A large portion of the big business of the State is interstate business. Litigation in relation to this goes into the Federal court and most of the nonresidents having litigation seek, if possible, the Federal court as a forum in which to litigate; so, without question, the increase of the business in the southern district is, and will be, rapidly increasing, and such increase will be permanent.

I will refer now to the thought which was in the mind of my good friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. The suggestion that the entire State of Florida be incorporated into one district, if adopted, would not apparently improve the situation nor meet the conditions. It would not, so far as the judge's expenses are concerned, reduce them in the least, for each judge would be entitled to his transportation and per diem expenses when away from the place of his residence. In addition to this, the handling of the entire business of a State through one clerk's office would seem to be quite impracticable, as the clerk would have to maintain, if he had a deputy at each place of holding court, 10 different deputies with 10 different offices, as I have heretofore stated, who would be scattered across the State, and some of them would be at a distance of about 1,000 miles apart, and it would be very impracticable to put upon one clerk, in addition to the personal duties he would have, the supervision of 10 different deputies with offices so scattered.

The foregoing reasons, showing the cost of the operation of courts in any other way, together with the burdens upon litigants in civil cases, justify the practically unanimous belief of the bar in the southern district that the most economical, expeditious, and satisfactory method of handling the business would be the appointment of one additional judge in the southern district of Florida. This is a conservative statement of the situation, based on official and reliable information furnished me and my own observation, experience, and knowledge. I submit that the reasons for providing an additional judge for the southern district of Florida are convincing. There can be no answer to the claim.

I will read, in this connection, a letter from a distinguished lawyer, a member of the bar at Jacksonville, which shows the difficulties involved in bringing in a judge from another district. He says:

* * * If the congestion in the courts was attributable alone to accumulation of criminal cases, the 18-judge measure would be a practical means of relief; for the criminal procedure does not materially differ in the several districts, and the judge from Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, or Louisiana can come into the southern district of Florida and try criminal cases with a reasonable degree of dispatch. But with civil business it is quite a different matter. Much of the civil business in this district is of a maritime nature. You can not make an admiralty lawyer, much less an admiralty judge, in a day or in a week. A judge from one of the interior cities has to feel his way along cautiously and doubts the correctness of his own conclusions, and is indeed fortunate if he comes out right in the end.

When he takes up bankruptcy business he is immediately confronted with a mass of property law of a purely local nature, resting in part in statutes and in part in decisions of the State courts construing the statutes. So when the judge turns to the law side of the court he finds, in addition to a procedure strange to him, the substantive rights of the parties affected by statutes and decisions entirely new to him. Every little question that arises during the trial, that would be turned off by a judge of such experience as Judge Call without conscious effort, but with entire accuracy, gives to a conscientious judge from outside an infinite amount of difficulty and consumes an immense amount of time. Upon the appellate bench the matter is very much simpler because the questions of procedure have been worked out in the lower court. The appellate court is only concerned with the decision of controlling issues, and where that decision turns upon doubtful questions of local law the doubt is ordinarily resolved, as it should be, in favor of the decision of the district judge.

Besides these considerations there are others that appear to be of trifling importance, but that you, as an experienced trial lawyer, will appreciate. The judge's coming is rarely announced for a day certain, and when it is announced for a day certain there is always more or less uncertainty as to just what work the judge will be engaged in. Directly one learns that a judge has been appointed to come into the district from outside, he goes about the giving of the necessary notices of hearing upon matters to be brought before the judge coming into the district only to find that the judge is coming a few days earlier or a few days later, or is to be engaged upon some other task, and by the time he has given another set of notices allowing 5 or 10 days, as the rule requires, he finds at the appointed time that the judge has tired of waiting for something to do and departed.

As you know, there is a great deal of nonresident capital invested in this State, and in addition to the very considerable admiralty and bankruptcy business a great deal of business is brought before the court on account of diversity of citizenship, and the delays in the disposition of business afford a premium to the removal of cases by defendants having that privilege. The population of the State has enormously increased and the business of the Federal courts with it. In addition to the creation of a number of courts of inferior jurisdiction, the staff of circuit judges has been more than doubled within my time, but in the Federal court we have the same staff that has existed from early times.

I doubt if, taken altogether, there is a more capable nisi prius judge than Judge Call to be found in any district court of the United States, but he is utterly unable to keep up with the work, and unless one of the 18 judges to be appointed was designated to spend his entire time in the southern district of Florida there would be no hope of ever getting rid of the congestion that now exists in this district.

Mr. President, I do not know that I can add any more to what I have said. I will point out to the Senate in a moment, however, how the districts in Florida are divided. Let me indicate on the map which Senators will see on the wall, placed here, however, for another purpose.

This is the northern district of Florida, from here to here [indicating on map]. This is the southern district. They might be more appropriately called the eastern and western districts, but they are not so designated. The northern district extends from about this line over here to the western line, with headquarters at Pensacola. Judge Sheppard sits at Pensacola. The southern district is all this portion of the State, with headquarters at Jacksonville. There is where Judge Call holds his chambers and has the headquarters of his court. He sits at Tampa, Ocala, Fernandina, Miami, and Key West; and you will see the distance he has to travel from Jacksonville, for instance, to Key West, or even down here to Miami, or even down here to Tampa. It is impossible to redistrict the State so as to remedy the situation, because if you do, for instance, Tampa, one of the important cities, would have to go in the northern district, and the litigants at Tampa would have to go around here to Pensacola to try their cases, some 600 miles. If you put Jacksonville over there, you would have Pensacola and Jacksonville, two large cities, in the northern district, with all these others in the southern district. The principal cities are Jacksonville, Tampa, Pensacola, Miami, Key West, Orlando, etc. The State can not be redistricted so as to meet the situation, and the whole difficulty calls for another judge for the southern district of Florida. The problem can not be solved in any other way.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 4, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious Lord, receive our offering of gratitude and grant unto us the blessing of Thy presence. Let Thy light shine forth, Thy power give strength, and Thy love bestow the mercy of forgiveness. O may Thy truth be wrought into human laws, into human institutions, and into human hearts. Spirit Divine, be with us to give us wisdom, to lighten the tasks, and direct the way. Establish our people in the ways of Thy commandments and be over our country like a happy summer time, giving promise of newer life and blessing to all. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND JUSTICE.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11065, making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary; and while that motion is pending I would be glad to come to an agreement as to the time for general debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] and myself have already had some discussion about the time, and the House being willing we have agreed upon 2 hours and 15 minutes on a side.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the general debate on this measure be limited to four and one-half hours, one-half of that time to be under the control of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and one-half under the control of myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the general debate on the pending bill be limited to four and one-half hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. HUSTED was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11065) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, with Mr. DOWELL in the chair.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, we are presenting to-day for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole a bill which is intended to cover, and which we believe does cover, all of the regular annual appropriations for the Department of State, including the entire foreign service, and also the appropriations for the Department of Justice, including the entire judicial system. It is really two appropriation bills in one, and so far as the House is concerned it is a new bill, in the sense that these items have never before been brought together under one cover. They have been taken from the diplomatic and consular bill; the legislative, executive, and judicial bill; and the sundry civil bill. The items have been arranged under the plan recommended by the President in the alternative budget. They have been very conveniently arranged. For example, take the part of the bill covering the State Department. First, we have all the items of appropriations relating to the State Department proper; next, all relating to the Diplomatic Service and then to the Consular Service; then to the various international boards and bodies which our Government partly supports, and finally to miscellaneous items. The advantages of this bill and of this arrangement are obvious from the legislative standpoint; they not only make for convenience but they make for economy. Heretofore when these items appeared in different measures it was impossible to get a real picture of the whole situation, and therefore extremely difficult to get balanced legislation. Now you can see all the activities of each department in their relations one to the other, so that you can make a proper estimate of the situation.

The State Department and the Department of Justice have grown tremendously during recent years. Take the State Department, for example: I think in 1895 the total appropriations were about $1,500,000. During the war they rose to something like $30,000,000, and now they stand at about $8,000,000.

The appropriations to-day are about twice as large as they were when we entered the war. So far as the State Department is concerned, that is partly due to a policy of expansion whereby the personnel of the department has been increased, particularly in the Diplomatic and Consular Service. It is also due to the increase of salaries, and to the increase of rents of our consulates and missions abroad, and to the increase of every kind of expense which the State Department incurs.

The increase in expenditures of the State Department is also due to additional activities which were not in existence before the war, particularly the viséing of passports, which work has cast upon our consulates a very heavy burden, indeed.

I suppose it will never be possible to get back to a pre-war basis; but the subcommittee felt that we should rather discourage the present policy of expansion and reduce just as much as was consistent with the maintenance of the activities of the State Department, at the most useful point of efficiency.

With respect to the Department of Justice the situation is somewhat different. In that department there has been no policy of expansion, but the business of the Department of Justice has increased tremendously on account of the war. For example, there are pending to-day in the State Department cases involving nearly $1,000,000,000. Those are claims actually in suit. In addition to that there are claims in suit in which the amount has not been determined, and they will probably come to at least a quarter of a billion dollars more. Those are civil cases alone.

About 60 per cent of all of our expenditures for the Department of Justice go into criminal business and only 40 per cent into civil business. The criminal business has increased tremendously, and it is a remarkable fact that while to-day crime in the States seems to be slightly on the decline, as shown by the records of the State courts, Federal crimes are upon the increase, and progressively so—that is, they are not only higher this year than they were last year, but each month the total number of crimes seems to be growing.

So when the subcommittee came to consider the question of reduction they had to consider questions of policy as well as questions of national need. In the State Department they had to consider the question of policy to a certain extent as well as the question of need. In the Department of Justice they had to consider solely the question of national needs.

As to the reductions effected, the appropriations recommended by this bill are about $7,500,000 less than the appropriations for the current year, and they are about $2,500,000 less than the estimates for the next fiscal year. You must not assume from that statement that the reductions in the estimates for the next fiscal year submitted by the department as compared with the appropriations for the current fiscal year are entirely due to retrenchment upon the part of the departments.

They are due partly to the fact that in the appropriations for the present year we carry in the State Department bill an item of $5,000,000 for Panama and an item of $1,000,000 for the international exposition at Rio de Janeiro and an item of $200,000 for the Limitation of Arms Conference. After you eliminate these extraordinary expenditures from the appropriations for the current year you will find that the estimates made by the departments for the next fiscal year are greater in amount than all the other appropriations for the current year. But the subcommittee has reduced these estimates by $2,500,000—$1,100,000 in the State Department and about $1,500,000 in the Department of Justice—and yet the reductions in the Department of State are greater in proportion than they are in the Department of Justice, because the appropriations for the Department of Justice are much greater than for the Department of State. The appropriations for the Department of Justice are about $18,000,000, whereas the appropriations for the Department of State are in the neighborhood of $8,000,000.

I want to call attention to the fact that these departments are partly self-sustaining. In the year 1921 the revenues of the Department of State were more than a million dollars in excess of all their expenditures. At the present time they are somewhat less on account of the enactment of the 3 per cent immigration law; but still at the present time I believe the income of the Department of State is equal to the cost of our entire foreign service.

The revenues of the Department of Justice are about one-third of the total expenditures of the department, and these revenues come from collections on judgments and from fines. It is the statement of the Attorney General that if we would grant him money enough to keep the investigations up to date, and keep the business of the department up to date, that the recoveries in fines would more than cover the additional amount of money which the department asked for. The subcommittee went very carefully into the detailed estimates, and while I do not want to say that these detailed estimates were made up as a mere matter of guesswork, still we found that they were very unsatisfactory and that we could not depend on them as a basis for recommending appropriations. We found, for example, in examining the detailed estimates that estimates which should have traveled together, when there was a general increase, did not bear any relation to each other. For instance, items of travel and subsistence, which should bear almost exact relation to each other, were sometimes in a relation of 5 to 1. In many cases we asked for reestimates, and the reestimates bore no relation, or no very close relation, to the original estimates which the department made. So in making up our recommendations for the next fiscal year we did not rely so much upon the detailed estimates for the year 1922, or for the next fiscal year, as we did on the actual expenditures in the year 1921. We took them as our basis because that was the last year in which complete details had been furnished.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's committee is an appropriating committee, and is authorized to appropriate only for those things which legislative committees make in order by law?

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman speaks of spending more money than we did during the war. If that is true, why did the gentleman's committee time after time place in this bill matters wholly unauthorized by law?

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman did not understand me correctly if he understood me to say that we were appropriating more money in either one of the departments than we did during the war. They are less than they were during the war.

Mr. BLANTON. It is the intention of the gentleman's committee to save as much as he can within the law.

Mr. HUSTED. Within the law.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has not answered my question why he put in these things which are legislation pure and simple.

Mr. HUSTED. There is absolutely no new legislation in this bill, or appropriations unauthorized by law, which does not decrease the expenditures of the Government, except in the case of some legislation which is current law, which is in the present appropriation bill, and which has been carried for years. There is no other legislation of any kind in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. When the time comes I shall call the gentleman's attention to numerous items of legislation.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. What about the items that were omitted, which caused the present appropriation for the next fiscal year to be $6,000,000 less than the present fiscal year?

Mr. HUSTED. It is seven and a half million dollars less than the actual appropriations for this year. The principal items are the $5,000,000 for the payment to Colombia under the treaty agreement, and $1,000,000 for the international exposition at Rio de Janeiro, and $200,000 for the Limitation of Arms Conference. I would say to the gentleman from Texas that there are no salary increases carried in this bill, that there are no new statutory positions created, and that there is no new legislation which is new to this bill which is not current law, which has not been carried in other appropriation bills, which does not reduce the expenditures of the Government. The principal items of new legislation are three. There is one reducing the salaries of the officers of the courts in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I point out one matter that is clearly legislation. Take, for instance, page 16, where appears the appropriation of $100,000 for the Pan American Union. The gentleman knows full well that under the law the life of that legislation extended over a period of only 10 years. The 10-year period elapsed two years ago. This is the beginning of the thirteenth year since the passage of the act. There is absolutely no legislation whatever for any dollar of this hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HUSTED. I do not know that quite well.

Mr. BLANTON. I presumed that the gentleman was familiar with the act.

Mr. HUSTED. I am quite familiar with the situation. In fact, it is not an act at all; it is a resolution adopted by the Pan American conference, and that resolution provided for adherence by the members for a period of 10 years; but there is another provision in the resolution that membership may be terminated upon two years' notice, and it has not yet been determined to my satisfaction whether that two years' notice must be given within the 10-year period or at any time after the 10-year period has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman happen to know that out of the hundred thousand dollars the employees of this Government in this particular department are using a part of that money to pay the premiums for insuring their own lives?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes; I am quite well aware of that.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman is in favor of furnishing to our employees their life insurance?

Mr. HUSTED. I assume that that matter will be fully debated later on. That is my understanding. One of the principal items of new legislation is that decreasing the salaries of the Territorial court in the Hawaiian Islands. Under what was known as the Hawaiian homes commission act, which passed this House some few years ago, the salaries of all of these court officials were substantially increased. The Department of Justice notified the subcommittee that they had known nothing about it at the time, that the bill had never been submitted to them, and the title did not disclose the fact that these increases were to be made. It is the understanding of the subcommittee that very few Members of the House were aware of the fact that that bill increased the salaries to the extent to which it did. The Department of Justice also said that they would not have recommended those increases, and that the increases are not deserved, so that this bill carries legislation bringing those salaries back to the basis upon which they stood when the Hawaiian homes commission act was first passed. If any increases are deserved, let them come in here in the proper way, submit their case properly, and have those questions passed on by the House. They were not debated by the House at the time, as I understand it, when the bill went through.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am glad to hear the statement of the gentleman, because of similar action with reference to the governor and some other officials in Hawaii. I have made some investigation, and I can say that there was no mention whatever on the floor of the House or the Senate of the fact that there was any increase.

Mr. HUSTED. That is my understanding and that is the understanding on which the subcommittee acted. Another item of legislation is one relating to the provisions of law for the care of stranded American seamen in foreign ports. This is a very desirable piece of legislation, but the Comptroller General has recently rendered a decision that our consuls can not bargain with the masters of vessels for the transportation to the United States of these stranded American seamen at less than the rate fixed by law, which is, I think, about 2 cents a mile. We have introduced legislation under which our consuls may bargain in the future as they have in the past with the masters of vessels for the conveyance of these stranded American seamen back to American ports at less than the statutory rate.

The third item is one in relation to the clerks of the United States circuit courts. The clerks of the United States circuit courts are paid a salary of $4,500 each, and in addition to that $500 out of the fees of the clerk's office go into their own pockets. These clerks also pay the expenses of their offices out of the fees, and fix the salaries of their subordinates, subject only to the approval of the presiding justice. There was no reason which appealed to the subcommittee as a good reason why these clerks should be carried on any different basis than the clerks of the district courts. The clerks of the district courts get their salaries and the fees are covered into the Treasury, and we have introduced legislation providing that the clerks of the United States circuit courts shall get their salaries and that the fees shall go into the Treasury of the United States. Upon the basis of business being conducted at the present time, and under ordinary good management, this will mean a net saving to the United States Government of from $30,000 to $45,000 a year.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did the subcommittee take up the question of increasing the salaries of the deputy clerks of the United States district courts?

Mr. HUSTED. That was considered, but no action was taken upon it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The deputy clerks are working at a very low rate of pay.

Mr. HUSTED. We considered that as a legislative matter which did not come within our jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUSTED. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary when Congress passed a bill fixing the salaries of the district clerks. Does the gentleman remember whether the matter of the circuit court clerks was considered at that time or not?

Mr. HUSTED. I do not want to be sure about it, but my recollection is that it was not considered.

There are no particular high spots in this bill, and there are very few controversial matters. But there are some items which should be discussed more fully, probably, than others, and I will touch briefly upon those in this general debate.

One is what is known as the emergency appropriation in the State Department. That is the appropriation for secret diplomatic work—for secret diplomacy. Before the war that stood at $75,000. During the war it went up as high as $600,000. In 1921 it was brought to $400,000; in 1922, in the bill of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] was in charge, it was reduced to $200,000, and we have further reduced it to $100,000, a sum which we consider fully adequate, especially under the testimony of the State Department officials themselves that very little of this money was expended for any purpose which could not properly be made public. As a matter of fact, this fund has been used as a reservoir upon which the department has drawn to fill wants in other appropriations.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I see in the International Boundary Commission of the United States and Mexico——

Mr. HUSTED. I will touch upon that in just a minute.

Mr. HUDSPETH. There is no provision here for the salary of commissioner. I want to ask my friend why?

Mr. HUSTED. I was going to take that up in just a moment and I will explain it fully. There is no need of a commissioner at the present time.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Who will do the work?

Mr. HUSTED. The work that is necessary will be done by an engineer, and all that is needed is an engineer to make survey and water gaugers to measure the water. All that is necessary to be done, all that can be done, is to preserve the data until such time as international relations with Mexico are resumed, when a commission can be reconstituted which can function, and some definite action be taken. We can do nothing now of substantial character except to preserve the data.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman has information, I suppose, that the river is changing and that land is in Mexico to-day that was in Texas yesterday. It is necessary to have a survey on that account.

Mr. HUSTED. I am advised of that, and we have made an appropriation to do all the work needed.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman spoke of resuming international relations with Mexico. Can he inform the committee when these relations will be resumed?

Mr. HUSTED. No, sir. Our committee is an appropriation committee and we have not anything to do with that in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not want the gentleman to misunderstand me and think that I asserted that the department is spending more money now than during the war. What I meant was that the department was spending more money than they did before the war, and I call attention to the fact that the appropriations for the coming fiscal year will be more for these departmental appropriations than for the year 1916.

Mr. HUSTED. I will say to the gentleman that our sole purpose is to effect all the reduction possible without injury to some useful activity. We have gone just as far as we thought we could go safely. In many cases we have cut to the bone. I think in one or two instances we have cut appropriations further than circumstances justified, and I will say this, that there is no item of appropriation where we did not bring it down to an amount which we thought barely enough to cover the actual necessities of the Government at the present time.

Mr. EVANS. Is there any activity provided, either in the Department of Justice or the Department of State, where the conditions are exactly the same as they were in 1916, where there has been an increase in the expenditure?

Mr. HUSTED. Of course, it is obvious that there are not.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. I will.

Mr. WINGO. What provision, if any, is in the bill in reference to an item in which the gentleman knows I have been interested, namely, the funds sufficient to supply United States district attorneys where some of them do not have United States Supreme Court reports?

Mr. HUSTED. The committee made some provision for that.

Mr. WINGO. I find on page 42 that you provide for the purchase and rebinding of law books, including the exchange thereof, for United States judges, district attorneys, and other judicial officers, and so forth, and appropriate the sum of $20,000, of which not to exceed 10 per cent, in the discretion of the Attorney General, may be used for the purchase of United States Reports and the Federal Reporter. Does the gentleman think that will be sufficient?

Mr. HUSTED. I would say frankly to the gentleman that there are so many items in the bill that I can not carry all the details in my head, but I do recollect distinctly, and I will be glad later on to give the gentleman full information, that we did consider this matter and made some provision for it, such as we thought under the present régime of economy was sufficient to tide them over.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman will recall that the Department of Justice has seemed to have no particular interest in these district attorneys.

Mr. HUSTED. I will say to the gentleman, if he will permit me to interrupt him, that the Department of Justice has this year evinced a very great interest in them and made a plea for them.

Mr. WINGO. That stricture really applies to former heads of the department. I was asking the gentleman whether or not that has really been taken care of.

Mr. HUSTED. Later on I will be able to furnish the gentleman full details about it, but I am not ready to give him all of the information that he would like yet. I will be able later to give him a detailed statement about it.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUSTED. Very gladly.

Mr. BURTON. On page 3, among reductions, the following are listed: "Clerks at embassies and legations, $94,828." Is that reduction due to a diminished number of employees or to diminished salaries? The same question would apply to the Consular Service, in which there is a proposed reduction of $100,000.

Mr. HUSTED. Well, that is partly a reduction in expenses, chiefly a reduction, I think, in expenses.

Mr. BURTON. This is under the head of salaries.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I think I can answer that question.

Mr. HUSTED. It is a reduction in the lump sum, made up of both salaries and expenses.

Mr. ROGERS. It is a reduction, if the gentleman will permit, below the estimates; but it is no reduction below the sums available under the current law for 1922.

Mr. HUSTED. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that we have been very careful to protect the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and particularly the Consular Service, and not to cut it below an amount sufficient to enable it to do all that it ought to do. Of course there is bound to be some reduction. Of course it is a question of policy as to how far we shall permit the Consular Service and the Diplomatic Service to remain expanded. They expanded tremendously during the war, and we feel they ought to get back a little toward the pre-war basis.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the salaries of consuls are fixed by law.

Mr. BURTON. Yes. Are the salaries at embassies and legations fixed by law?

Mr. HUSTED. The salaries of ambassadors, ministers, and consuls and, within certain limits, the salaries of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service are fixed by law.

Mr. BURTON. There have been no salary decreases in the Consular Service?

Mr. HUSTED. There have been many salary increases, so that there are more clerks in the higher salary ranges than there were a few years ago.

Mr. BURTON. Some of them could be discontinued?

Mr. HUSTED. There is no reduction below the current law. There is no reduction below the amount carried in the Diplomatic and Consular bill for the current year. These reductions are below the estimates made by the department for the next fiscal year.

Mr. BURTON. Then is this the case, that the estimates transmitted contemplated an increase in the number of consular officers?

Mr. HUSTED. Oh, they contemplate a very substantial increase for expense account, and for additional clerks, and for one thing and another.

Mr. BURTON. What I was especially calling attention to was the salaries in the Consular Service.

Mr. HUSTED. They are not affected at all.

Mr. BURTON. But the reduction of $100,000 must mean a decrease in the number.

Mr. HUSTED. The reduction is below the estimates for salaries and expenses, not below the current law. It does not reduce the present personnel, but it does prevent the increases which the department would like to make.

Mr. BURTON. In other words, the department recommended an increase in the number of consular officers. The committee did not think it best to agree to that increase?

Mr. HUSTED. We did not, because we thought reductions could be effected sufficiently to take care of any additional need. Of course, if we get into Russia we will need more consulates there, but so far as Germany and the Central Powers were concerned, while we withdrew from Germany and withdrew from Austria, the consular officers were not dismissed. They were still carried on the rolls and spread around here and there; and when we go back into Germany, as we have done now, and into Austria, we can use the men who are still on the list.

Mr. BURTON. They have been carried on the roll?

Mr. HUSTED. They have been carried on the roll. There is no evidence that any of them have been let go.

The next item is the item for post allowances. This is carried on page 13 of the bill. This is a provision which enables the State Department to pay more salaries. During 1918 and 1919 this appropriation stood at $700,000. In the year 1920 it was reduced to $600,000. It was carried at $600,000 in the year 1921. In 1922 it was reduced to $250,000, and we make a further reduction, bringing it down to $200,000. The purpose of this appropriation was to enable the Secretary to pay additional salaries to diplomatic and consular officers at posts where the cost of living had advanced. Take Japan, for example: The Japanese yen stands on practically the same exchange basis with the American dollar that it did before the war; but they say that the cost of living in Japan has advanced 100 per cent, and that a consular officer who received a salary of $3,000 would, as a matter of fact, have a salary with the purchasing power of only $1,500. In the past this has apparently been a very pressing matter, and it was really necessary to do something, and therefore this provision was made.

But we found that the basis upon which this advance in the cost of living at these different posts had been ascertained was very unsatisfactory. They say they took the index number of wholesale commodities in the country where the post was located, and then they figured out the rate of exchange, and figuring out the rate of exchange with the index number of the cost of commodities and considering also reports which came from these consulates and these missions, they estimated at the State Department here the advance in the cost of living, and then they paid them some additional salary out of this fund. Two years ago they were paying additional salaries to diplomatic and consular officers who were receiving as much as $6,000 and $8,000 a year, and during the last year and during the current year they have been paying to men at some posts 100 per cent advance upon $3,000 salaries, paying men $6,000 a year in good American cash whose salaries were only $3,000 a year. While we realize that conditions are disturbed in some of these countries, and while it is probably necessary that some provision should be made for this purpose, we think it rather a dangerous thing to put a large fund in the hands of the State Department to use for such purposes, so we cut it down $50,000, and possibly we might better have cut it down a little more, but we have cut it down as far as we thought we could do safely, and under very vehement protest, I can assure you.

I have already alluded to the Mexican Boundary Commission, and I think no further statement about that is needed.

With reference to the Alaska and Canadian Boundary Commission, that is a work which has been dragging along for years and years, and it seemed as if it never would come to a conclusion. It was for many years under the chargé of Doctor Barnard, but within the last year it has been turned over to Colonel Jones, who is the head of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Colonel Jones gets no additional salary whatever for looking after this work, and I believe he is determined to bring it to a conclusion as rapidly as possible. He says this can be done within two years if he is not too much skimped in the matter of the appropriations. All of the work of defining the boundary has been completed. All of the monuments have been erected, but there is a lot of work yet to be done in making maps from field notes and in preparing the data in a form suitable for publication and preservation. However, I am glad to say that it does look as if this work would soon come to an end and this activity and expense be terminated.

The next item you will find on page 19. That is the one covering the British and American claims. These are claims of American nationals against the British Government, of British nationals against the American Government, of American nationals against British nationals, and of British nationals against American nationals in cases which can not otherwise be adequately handled and full justice be done to the litigants. There are pending to-day two cases before this commission involving one and one-third million dollars. There are 12 cases remaining to be presented, involving $7,500,000. The American awards made by this commission amount to $9,630 and the British awards to $120,416. The total cost of this arbitration has been greater than the total amount of these British and American awards from the time the arbitration commission came into existence down to date. Of course, this work was suspended during the war and very little business was done. They now propose to go forward and clean it up.

Mr. MANN. That probably answers what I was going to ask; but will it be cleaned up, or is this permanent?

Mr. HUSTED. It may drag along for a while, but it can not very well be permanent, because all of the claims are listed in the arbitration treaty. No other claims can be brought in unless a new treaty is entered into.

Mr. MANN. That treaty was nearly 12 years ago.

Mr. HUSTED. Nearly 12 years ago. The treaty was entered into in 1910, and then the Arbitration Commission was established and went ahead and did business for about a year. The war came on, and during the war the business of the commission was entirely interrupted.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it is likely to close up as long as three gentlemen get a summer vacation at $1,200 a month?

Mr. HUSTED. Past experience would make it appear very doubtful, but I believe this work will be pushed from now on, and that sufficient pressure will be brought to bear upon these gentlemen to compel them to consider cases and render awards. There are only a few cases pending altogether, although they involve in the aggregate a very large amount of money, indeed.

Mr. BLANTON. Before the gentleman closes will he yield for a question?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The Mexican Government, as I understand, has provided a building out here on Sixteenth Street for its embassy. In case the State Department should see fit to recognize the government of Mexico at an early date, has any provision been made in this bill for the incidental expenses attached to such recognition?

Mr. HUSTED. Nothing, I think.

Mr. BLANTON. Are we to understand, then, by the action of the committee, as expressing the will of the administration, that there is probably no chance for the Mexican Government to be recognized during the next fiscal year ending June 30, 1923?

Mr. BURTON. If the gentleman will allow me, why should an appropriation provide for a contingency which may or may not occur? Until recognition is given, the Committee on Appropriations will have nothing to do with it.

Mr. BLANTON. Wise men make preparations sometimes in advance of probable contingencies.

Mr. HUSTED. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I can answer him. The bill does carry an item of $17,500 for an American ambassador to Mexico.

Mr. BLANTON. There are incidental expenses connected with it, of course.

Mr. HUSTED. Quite right. I was misinformed.

Mr. ROGERS. Before the gentleman leaves the discussion of the State Department, I desire to ask one or two questions. I observe that in the hearings the committee gave some attention to the question of the passport-control system, which, as he said earlier in his remarks to-day, is a great producer of revenue. It has always occurred to me that the effective way to enforce the immigration laws was to have some American instrumentality abroad by which inspection could be made before the intended emigrant started for the United States. I have heard it rumored that some governments have indicated reluctance to allow American officials to be assigned for the purpose of supervising the immigration problem at the point of origin.

Has the gentleman any information on that which was developed in the hearings and which he can impart to the committee?

Mr. HUSTED. I do not think we have any information on that. I do not think there was anything in relation to it in the hearings.

Mr. ROGERS. A year ago—and I notice this was dealt with to some extent in the hearings—the appropriation act provided the requisite authority for the acceptance for use as the American embassy of the Morgan house in London. Nearly a year has elapsed since that time. I have reliable information that the donor has always been ready and most willing to transfer it. I assume that we ought to have an appropriation for making the house ready for occupancy by the American ambassador. Is there any real justification for a year's delay in accepting the gift and in making the requisite changes?

Mr. HUSTED. If there is any I am not aware of it. I do not think any good reason can exist. It is going to be necessary to make the house over inside in order to have it suitable for the purposes of an embassy. Why plans and specifications have not been prepared for the work I do not know. I think it should have been done as a business proposition.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman must know where the responsibility lies.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not think the gentleman from New York is misapprehending my inquiry; but it is a little discouraging for Congress to try to assist the foreign service by providing permanent homes for our representatives abroad and then have a whole year elapse without the Department of State even taking title to the property that we have authorized them to acquire.

Mr. HUSTED. The commitee might be interested in having me read a statement by Mr. Carr, of the State Department:

> That gift has been accepted by the President, and Mr. Morgan has received a letter of thanks. Since that time the lawyers have been endeavoring to make a legal transfer of the property to the United States Government. Under the British law the transfer can not be made in simple form, but, as I understand it, has to be made to trustees or to some individual. The last proposal of the lawyers was that it be transferred to the American ambassador and the American consul general in London as trustees. However, the transfer has not as yet been perfected, but I think it will be in a very short time. There are also some complications or details about adjusting our legal requirements to the British requirements in respect to some other matters, but we will get title to it shortly, and a sound title.

Now, I had assumed that the delay in this matter is the usual unbusinesslike delay which you naturally expect in diplomatic negotiations.

Mr. ROGERS. I hoped at the time this authorization was granted a year ago that the title would very promptly be transferred to the United States. I have heard that the donor himself is exceedingly disturbed at the delay which has resulted. I had hoped further that the gentleman in this bill this year would be able to find that the title to the property had been accepted, and hence be able to recommend the requisite appropriation which he justly says will be necessary for actual occupancy by the ambassador.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman understands that the Committee on Appropriations acts only on estimates?

Mr. ROGERS. I understand that. Congress has done all that it could, and it did it promptly and completely. Now, it seems to me that when we have done all that we can and when the matter has become an executive matter, it is discouraging not to have this appropriation acted upon by the State Department for a whole year.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman answer me a question? Who is responsible for taking over the building, remodeling it, and putting it in order?

Mr. HUSTED. The State Department.

Mr. FISH. What individual, or what branch?

Mr. HUSTED. I do not know; anybody whom the Secretary of State assigns to it.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman does not know whether that task has been assigned?

Mr. HUSTED. I know nothing about it.

Mr. ROGERS. One other question: A year ago in the bill for 1922 an appropriation was authorized of $150,000 for the purchase of an embassy at Paris. I notice that in this year's hearings it was brought out that that $150,000 has been found to be entirely inadequate. I recall very well the sentiment of the House when the appropriation of $150,000 was authorized. I think it went through the House unanimously. I wondered if the gentleman from New York would look with favor on an amendment in the proper place which would give the additional sum necessary to make the prior appropriation a workable thing?

Mr. HUSTED. I would not want to give a definite answer without taking it up with the subcommittee and the whole Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish the gentleman would consider it before the bill is ready for amendment.

Mr. HUSTED. Now, Mr. Chairman, I find that my time is passing rapidly and I have consumed more time than I anticipated. I will take up the item for the enforcement of national prohibition.

The Department of Justice asked for a direct appropriation of $150,000 for clerks and expert assistants in the enforcement of national prohibition. They omitted from the bill the allocation of $200,000 for legal assistants in the enforcement of prohibition. After very careful consideration the committee decided to restore the allocation of $200,000 for assistants and make an allocation, not a direct appropriation, of $150,000 for clerk hire. That disposal of the matter seemed to meet with the favor of all interested, and I think is a happy solution of it, because I believe the direct appropriation of $150,000 was not necessary. It simply gave the department $150,000 for clerical hire more than was actually needed.

They have gotten along with the money from the regular appropriation for clerk hire heretofore, and they can get along with it just as well during the next fiscal year as at the present time.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. HILL. On page 30 of the bill I find an item of $150,000 and on page 39 of $200,000. Does the bill appropriate in all $350,000 for the enforcement of the national prohibition act?

Mr. HUSTED. It does not appropriate a cent. It simply allocates from other appropriations certain amounts to be set aside and used for that purpose.

Mr. HILL. In other words, the bill provides that of the general appropriation for the department $350,000 may be used for prohibition enforcement?

Mr. HUSTED. That is it exactly. They are not compelled to use it, but they may use $200,000 for legal assistants to help district attorneys enforce the prohibition law, and they may use $150,000 for clerk hire for that specific purpose.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman has no reason to believe that they will not use it.

Mr. HUSTED. I have no advices about the matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman from Maryland approve of that?

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, the next item is for the detection and prosecution of crime. We have increased the amount of the current appropriation $250,000, making the total appropriation $2,250,000. In 1921 that appropriation was $2,400,000. It was cut down to $2,000,000 in last year's bill, but there are to-day over 6,000 investigations which the Department of Justice is unable to make through lack of funds. This increase of $250,000 is made because of the apparent inadequacy of the appropriation for the current year. As a matter of fact, the amount of crime in the country is vastly greater to-day than it was in 1921, when $2,400,000 was barely sufficient, so that in giving them $2,250,000 I think no one need fear that we have exceeded a reasonable amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inform the gentleman that he has consumed one hour.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I notice that provision is made for books for the law library.

Mr. HUSTED. Would not the gentleman just as leave go into that under the five-minute rule, because that goes into minutiæ which I am not carrying in my mind, and I should be glad to give him the information when we consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FESS. I simply wanted to ask whether we get the decisions from the Supreme Court—whether we are on the mailing list?

Mr. HUSTED. We are for a certain number, but not for all. I want to say a word about the Court of Claims, and to say what I have to say in the spirit of compliment. The Court of Claims is one of the most important courts in the United States to-day. It handles every variety of case which may possibly arise between a sovereign and a subject growing out of contract. It also handles a vast amount of cases under the Dent law and such other cases as are submitted to it by the Congress. This is a very busy court, and yet it is running at a minimum of expense. Its calendar is right up to the minute. There are now pending before the Court of Claims 700 cases involving $325,000,000, and there are war claims estimated to amount to between two and three billion dollars which will come to the Court of Claims. There are $300,000,000 worth of war claims alone there now. The court is doing a very wonderful work, and I am very glad of the opportunity to commend it for its diligence and its economy. While it is doing this vastly increased amount of work and doing it on time, it has not asked for any more money.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Agreeing with the gentleman as to what he says about the Court of Claims, has the gentleman found that the Federal courts ordinarily work with as much diligence?

Mr. HUSTED. I do not want to say anything in criticism of the other courts at all.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like to know whether the gentleman has any opinion on that subject.

Mr. HUSTED. I simply wanted to say something in commendation of the Court of Claims.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I quite agree with the gentleman as to that, but I wanted to get the other matter discussed to an extent, if the gentleman is in a position to do it.

Mr. HUSTED. I might say to the gentleman that this is an appropriation committee, and I am here to furnish facts and not opinions, but I did want to go out of my way a little bit to say something for the Court of Claims.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman is such a very able and experienced lawyer and can take such very wide and careful survey of matters that any information he might furnish us would prove of value.

Mr. HUSTED. I deeply appreciate what the gentleman says, but prefer not to give an opinion on a subject on which I do not feel sufficiently informed. Mr. Chairman, another very important item is the item for assistants to the Attorney General and to the United States district attorneys. These men carry on chiefly the cases which have been pressed upon the Government as a result of war. Many of them are patent cases. The patent cases in actual suit which are handled by these assistants amount now to $231,000,000, and the patent cases which are to be filed and which will soon result in suits amount to $250,000,000 more, or $481,000,000 worth of patent cases alone. That does not include the cases where the amounts remain yet to be determined. There are 31 attorneys engaged in these patent cases. They are not on the statutory roll. They are engaged under an agreement with the Attorney General by which they can not charge more than $1,000 a month, or $12,000 in any one year, totally irrespective of the amount done in any one month or in any one year. They have to render itemized statements every month, they have to show that they have actually performed services to the value of $1,000 in order to get that amount and proportionately less, but they can not get any more than that. Some of these men have incomes from their profession of $100,000 a year and upward. They are some of the most eminent patent lawyers in the United States. They work in their own offices and they do not work here in the District.

Mr. FESS. Some of these cases are such that the best talent in the country is employed. Are we as a Government equipped to take care of such matters?

Mr. HUSTED. I am glad to say that we are fully equipped to meet anybody at the bar in the trial of these important cases involving millions of dollars. We have one patent case which involves about $125,000,000.

Mr. FESS. That sort of a case would employ the best talent in America on the other side. The Government is equipped to meet it?

Mr. HUSTED. The Government is equipped to meet it. And I want to say this, that I think the fact that these men are entering into these arrangements with the Government, whereby we get their services for $12,000 a year, is partly due, at least, to patriotic considerations.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. They are not connected with the Shipping Board, then, are they?

Mr. HUSTED. They are not.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I was interested in the gentleman's statement about the amounts involved in patent litigation. I do not just understand that. Are these claims against our Government or patents had in connection with the war?

Mr. HUSTED. They are patent-infringement cases.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Did we infringe on the patents?

Mr. HUSTED. That is the claim.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The ordinary patent litigation the Government has nothing to do with?

Mr. HUSTED. Some are cases of patent infringement and some are cases of patent appropriation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman name some of the articles on which patents are said to have been infringed?

Mr. HUSTED. Well, I will mention alleged infringement of patents on certain types of building construction. They involve a tremendous amount of money. I want to say, as to the penal institutions, that we did not get very satisfactory information, for the reason that the estimates were made by the wardens at the penitentiaries, and they had no good, reliable information, or detailed information, here in the Department of Justice.

They had ample notice to get it, because we had preliminary hearings there in January, but they did not have it at the time our hearings were held, and we could not get it. But we found that the average cost of subsistence was about 30 cents per inmate per day. So, finding it as low as that, I came to the conclusion that the institutions must be reasonably economically administered.

Mr. CLOUSE. The gentleman says that the cost of the maintenance of the inmates in the Federal prisons is 30 cents a day.

Mr. HUSTED. The average, running through the year. Of course, that is partly due to the fact that we maintain fairly large and fairly productive and well-managed farms at these institutions.

Mr. CLOUSE. I was wondering if the gentleman had made any investigation with reference to detaining our prisoners, who are convicted of smaller crimes, in the penitentiaries instead of in the jails. Does the gentleman think that the Government ought to have four or five institutions, and then detain such prisoners as that at $1.17 a day for jail fees throughout the country?

Mr. HUSTED. That is a matter of legislation that does not come within our jurisdiction, and one which we have not considered. but it seems to me that the gentleman's conclusion about it is sound and correct.

I want to say a word in conclusion as to those who served on the subcommittee. Two of the members who were originally assigned to us did not serve with us. Mr. LEE of Georgia was engaged in another subcommittee and could not be with us, and Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado was unfortunately ill. But we were very fortunate in having assigned to our committee Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, who attended, I think, every session of the subcommittee, although he was sick enough half of the time to be in bed. [Applause.] And I want to thank that subcommittee and every member of it for the splendid support which I received from them. They were diligent, they were active, and they were in attendance all the time.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I desire to request that I be not interrupted relative to matters which may be more appropriately inquired about during the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule.

As a minority member of the subcommittee I can not but congratulate the committee in their efforts, in the main, to curtail expenditures. There are, however, some appropriations made in the bill which have been made upon sentiment rather than out of necessity. There are others which may have been increased too largely, and others which, perhaps, have been reduced to too great an extent. Those I prefer to take up under the five-minute rule, rather than now. At this time I wish to discuss more particularly the report made by the committee. I do not wish to be understood as entertaining any thought that any statement made in the report is not true. Upon the contrary, I find that every statement made in the report is technically true, but calculated to mislead, and I wish to warn those who read it against forming opinions which are not justified.

On page 3 of the report we find this language:

> For the Department of State this bill proposes appropriations totaling $9,448,736.16, which is $7,405,609.93 less than was appropriated for the current fiscal year, and $1,137,665 less than the estimates for 1923. The appropriations for the current year include $5,000,000 for payment to Colombia, $1,000,000 for participation in the international exposition at Rio de Janeiro, and $200,000 for the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments. Leaving these appropriations out of the calculations, the amount recommended in the accompanying bill is $1,205,609.93 less than the current law.

It will be noticed that an appropriation made in the preceding bill, which now the current law, of $1,000,000 for the exposition at Rio de Janeiro has been eliminated and is not to be considered in making up the totals of the report. I have no criticism as to the elimination of that particular item, but I would be glad to know why similar items have been included in the report, unless to suggest unwarranted conclusions. A million dollars, I say, was appropriated for the Rio de Janeiro exposition. That amount is set aside and not considered in the report.

The current law also carried for the "Commission to Peru," $15,000. Upon the same theory or principle, why was not that $15,000 also eliminated from the report?

Again, for the "Arbitration with Peru," $45,000 was appropriated in the current law and is not carried in this bill. Why is it included in the report, except for the purpose of comparing the amount appropriated in this bill with that of the preceding bill?

Again, there was appropriated in the preceding bill $60,000 for the "Arbitration with Norway." If the $1,000,000 for the Rio de Janeiro exposition is set aside and not considered in the report, why should not the $60,000 for the "Arbitration with Norway" also be eliminated from this report and not considered?

Again, in the preceding bill, payment to Anna Gayle White of $4,500 was authorized. Anna Gayle White has been settled with. She has received her $4,500. Yet that amount, while it is carried in this report for the purpose of running up the totals, should be eliminated from this report upon exactly the same principle as the $1,000,000 for the exposition at Rio de Janeiro was eliminated.

Again, we find that payment was made to Mary A. Higgins to the amount of $4,000. Mary A. Higgins has been paid, and because we do not pay her again the item is carried in the report, whereas it should be eliminated just as the appropriation for Rio de Janeiro was.

Next we have an item of $2,258.30 for the relief of Stewart & Corbin. They have been paid. That amount should have been eliminated just exactly as was the appropriation for the Rio de Janeiro exposition, and not carried in the report so as to swell one of the totals.

Then, in the preceding bill, there is an appropriation of $481,000 for "buildings and grounds for our embassies and legations." All of that $481,000 has been spent except $14,435, making $466,565 actually spent. Now, why should that $466,565 be carried in this report, except for the purpose of swelling a total, when all of the original amount except $14,435 has long ago been spent? Why should not that $466,565 also be eliminated just as was the $1,000,000 appropriated for the exposition at Rio de Janeiro?

Then there is the "Boundary Commission between the United States and Canada." For the current year $36,500 was appropriated in the preceding bill. This bill gives $30,000, making a saving of $6,500. But that is no real saving. The $36,500 was not needed, just as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] said, because the field work is virtually completed. Nothing more is now needed except for office work. Therefore that is not a real cutting of appropriations because of a disposition to economize. It is a cut only because there is no necessity for the work, and it is so conceded.

Next, we have in the report a reference to an item for the relief of the widow of Joseph B. Akin of $1,095. The widow of Joseph B. Akin has been paid. Yet this amount of $1,095 is carried in the report to swell a total, while that, too, should have been eliminated just as was the million dollars for the Rio de Janeiro exposition.

Then, in the preceding bill there was an appropriation of $50,000 for the purpose of "prosecuting the suits affecting oil lands," notwithstanding that those suits have been withdrawn. That amount should be eliminated from this report, just exactly as the $1,000,000 was eliminated for the Rio de Janeiro exposition.

Then we have in the report an item of $5,000 for the suits which have been set aside relative to the Five Civilized Tribes. That, too, should not be in this report. Yet it serves to swell a total.

Then, in the report there is another $5,000 appropriation for the Pacific Railroad suits, which have been dismissed. That $5,000 is used in the report to swell a total in order to make it appear that this bill appropriates less than the preceding bill does.

Those figures that I have just read amount to $641,418. But that is not all. There is carried in the report as a saving an item of $1,500 for "rent of buildings." The building is not being rented. There is no excuse for another $1,500 to be spent; yet the item is carried in the report and serves the purpose of swelling a total in order to show that the appropriations this year are much less than they were last year.

Then, under the caption of "Chargé d'affaires ad interim," the appropriation for the current year is $58,000. The department recommended only $50,000 and the bill allows $50,000. The department recognizes that, because of changed conditions, they could get along with $8,000 less than last year; but the committee in its report uses that $8,000 reduction as a cut, when, if they had spent it, it would have been wasted. As I said, on account of changed conditions, the department did not ask for it, and said there was no use for it.

In the item, "Passport control act," the current law called for $600,000; but, because of changed conditions, again the Department of State said that $425,000 was sufficient. This bill carries, not the recommendation of the department, but instead $350,000; and they claim, in order to swell a total, that they should have the benefit of the difference between $350,000 and $600,000 instead of using the difference between $350,000 and $425,000, which is $75,000, and not $250,000, as used in the report. Therefore they have in their report used the amount $175,000, and that serves to swell a total and to unduly magnify the difference between the present bill and the preceding one.

Then, under the caption of "Salaries while being instructed for Diplomatic and Consular Service" for the current year, we have $90,000. This year, because of changed conditions, the department recommends $65,000; but, in making up the report, they have made the deduction from the $90,000 instead of from the $65,000, which makes a difference of $15,000.

Under the item of "Transportation of diplomatic and consular officers" the current law is $370,000. On account of changed conditions the department asked for only $300,000. The present bill allows $275,000; but, in order again to make the difference between these two bills appear large, $275,000 has been subtracted from $370,000 instead of from the $300,000. That again makes a difference of $70,000 in swelling a total.

Under the caption of "International Joint Commission to Great Britain," the current law provides $44,000. The department asked for only $38,000. The present bill grants $38,000. Yet the report, claiming a real cut, subtracted the $38,000 from the $44,000 of the current law, instead of subtracting it from the recommendation of the department. There, again, the total is swelled by $6,000.

Under the caption of "Interallied Committee for Reeducation for War Cripples" we have $6,000 allowed under the current law, but that committee has been discontinued entirely; and, because there is no occasion to appropriate this $6,000, again they claim a credit, thereby swelling a total in order to make the difference between the two bills as big as possible.

Under "International trade-mark registration" in the present law there is appropriated $14,100, but the department says we need only $9,600. That amount is appropriated in this bill. Yet, again, swelling a total, the report has subtracted what the department says they ought to have, from last year's appropriation, thereby making a balance of $4,512, which again swells a total.

The total of the sums which I have just read amounts to $286,012, which, added to those upon the preceding page that I have just read, make $927,430.

The report carries the statement that $1,205,609 has been saved as between this bill and the preceding one; yet if we take the $927,430, that I have just mentioned, from the $1,205,609 we have a difference between the two bills of only $278,179. But here comes a very important matter. They not only eliminated the $1,000,000 which went to the exposition at Rio de Janiero—but, as I have just said, the report fails to eliminate like sums which would reduce the difference to $278,179—but they eliminated entirely another item of $5,000,000.

Under the law we must pay Panama every year $250,000. This bill appropriates that $250,000, because that sum must be paid annually. But we are bound also by law to pay Colombia $5,000,000 every year for five years. The current law appropriated $5,000,000 for Colombia; but not one penny does this bill appropriate for the coming year to pay Colombia. We must pay it annually, but in this bill the $5,009,000 is eliminated and is not considered at all, and this item makes a great difference between the two bills. How are we to pay Colombia $5,000,000 in the next year unless it is appropriated? It can now be appropriated in no other way than in a deficiency bill. The $5,000,000 cuts a big figure in the reduction of $7,000,000 and more which it is claimed to be the difference between the two bills.

But that is not all. When we reach the Department of Justice, under the head of "Miscellaneous items" the current law appropriates $48,000; but, again, on account of changed conditions, the department asked for only $40,000. The committee gave them $37,000. There they did save $3,000, but only $3,000. Still they claim the difference between $37,000, which they gave, and the $48,000 which they gave last year, when, as I said, only $40,000 was asked for this year, the larger amount not being asked.

Then in the current law we have $7,500 for repairs to the Court of Claims building. That has been repaired and the money spent. No more money is asked for; none is needed for the purpose at all; yet, in the figures in the report this $7,500 is carried, while it should have been eliminated, just as was the $1,000,000 appropriated for the Rio de Janeiro exposition, which is carried for the purpose of increasing the difference between these two bills.

Then under the head of "Supreme Court reports" the current law allows $1,057.50. The department, under changed conditions, asked for $585. The committee gave the $585 asked for. They did not waste money by giving more than was asked; but in order to increase an apparent saving they have subtracted the $585 from the $1,057 instead of offsetting it against exactly the amount which was asked for.

Then we have the Leavenworth, Kans., prison. Last year for that we appropriated $818,100. This time the department asked for $763,600. The committee gave $756,600. Again the committee, with the effect of enlarging the difference between the two bills, subtracted the $756,600 from the $818,100 of last year, instead of subtracting it from the amount that the department asked for. That makes a difference of $54,500 in favor of the difference between the two bills.

Then, for the "National Training School for Boys," the current law gives $64,036; but the department this time asks for only $60,736, and that amount the committee gives. But, again, enlarging the difference between the two bills, the amount allowed is subtracted from the appropriation of last year instead of being subtracted from the amount asked for. Consequently, no saving has been made; and again the difference between these two bills is enlarged by the amount of $3,300.

Then, under the item of "Miscellaneous expenses," to be found on page 16 of the report, there is $665,000 in the current law. And, again, on account of changed conditions, the department only asked for $600,000. That amount is appropriated in this bill. In making that deduction they do not subtract the amount appropriated from the amount estimated for, but they subtract from the amount appropriated last year, when the necessities were greater, thereby making a difference of $65,000. The total of these last items is $133,772. So, if we also deduct those items, which merely seem to be reductions, but which in reality are not, then the excess in this bill for the Department of Justice over and above last year's bill is $436,832, and not $303,110 as stated in the report.

When the $5,000,000 that should be in this bill for the payment of the amount due Colombia is considered, and then take into account the items I have mentioned as having been used to swell the total relied on to reduce the amount appropriated by this bill, the balance will not be $1,205,609 in favor of this bill, but instead will be far more than four millions against the report.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman can not say that it would be five million and some odd dollars greater than the current law, assuming that the $5,000,000 payment to Colombia was taken out of the current law. The gentleman is taking the $5,000,000 out twice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I am taking it out but once. The report says that the appropriations in this bill for the Department of State are $1,205,609 less than current law, and that the appropriation herein for the Department of Justice is $303,110 more than current law. Therefore this bill is only $902,599 less than current law, according to the report. But if we deduct the items which should have been eliminated, just as was the $1,000,000 for the Rio de Janeiro exposition, then the balance would not be as stated in the report; and when the $5,000,000 for Colombia is considered, the difference would be still more against the accuracy of the report.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another item in the bill for the "Detection and prosecution of crime." That item is increased in this bill $250,000. That may be all right, and I doubt not that it is. I am not complaining about it at all; I agree with it. But if we need $250,000 more to prosecute crime, that means more prosecution; that means more cases; that means more juries; that means more witnesses.

But the amount for juries has been decreased $50,000 in this bill, and the amount for witnesses has been decreased $100,000. So, while the amount for the prosecution of crimes is increased $250,000, the amount for juries and witnesses is decreased $150,000; and the two propositions can not be reconciled in actual practice.

In my humble judgment it will be necessary either not to spend the $250,000, or bring in a deficit for some amount to meet the decreased amount of appropriation for juries and witnesses.

In the bill there is an item for "Claims between the United States and Great Britain." I regret that neither I nor the chairman of the committee can give you any enlightening information on the subject. This commission, as suggested by the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. HUSTED, has been running along for years. The committee undertook to ascertain the number and amount and nature of the claims. That was insisted upon. Let me read to you from the hearings the astounding statements made in response to the questions put by different members of the committee:

Tattler—first claim; Tattler—second claim; Argonaut and French; David J. Adams; Lord Nelson; Canadienne; Eastry; Lindisfarne; King Robert; Yukon Lumber; Hardman; Cadenhead; Great Northern Telegraph; Hemming; Coquitlam; Favourite; Wanderer; Kate; Newchwang; Sidra; Jessie, Bayard & Pescawha.

That is the information that this committee has as to the claimants, and the nature of their claims.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is there anything as to how old the claims are?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not recall, but they are all old. Now, can anybody tell me why we should appropriate money to a live-for-ever commission to arbitrate claims that not only your committee but Congress is denied the right to know who the claimants are and the nature of the claims?

After that list was sent to the committee the request was renewed, but the committee was not given any information concerning it. Private information came to me and to the chairman of the committee, saying that if more detailed information were given it might embarrass the claimants or the attorneys.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I heard it, in one of the claims only the initials are given.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I did not intend it that way, but if only the initials had been given they would have conveyed just as much information as the full name would have done.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And it is true that the committee could not tell from the testimony who the real claimant was?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The committee to this moment does not know anything more about it than does the man in the moon. The department declines to tell Congress who the claimants are, as well as the nature of the claims.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is public business, and the taxpayers are interested in that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The department declines to tell upon the assertion that it might embarrass some claimant or attorney. If it would embarrass them, so much more the reason why it should come out and why the Congress should know why they are appropriating this money. [Applause.] One of the items is for "Kate." Who is Kate? The arbitrators concluded to pay Kate, whoever Kate is, and they make this note relative to the payment:

Recommendation of payment of some amount as an act of grace.

They pay Kate, but they paid her only as an act of grace, and they will not tell the nature of the claim because it might embarrass the claimant or some attorney in this commission or for the claimant. Kate filed seemingly a questionable claim for $4,044.75, but as a matter of "grace" they paid her $1,008.05, and nobody on this earth except Kate and those whom light on this subject might embarrass knows to whom it was paid. Is such a thing to be tolerated?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is that the name of a woman or a boat?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We do not know anything about it. All it says is "Kate," and there it stops. They will not give us any information, because they say it might embarrass somebody.

There are some other items in this bill which I wish to discuss, but I shall delay their discussion until we reach them under the five-minute rule.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ROGERS). The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-five Members present; not a quorum. The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOWELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11065, the Departments of State and Justice appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, when 275 Members answered to their names, and he handed in a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, by Executive order signed by President Harding, on Friday, March 31, 1922, the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and 31 chiefs and assistant chiefs of divisions in that bureau, including four women chiefs, were summarily removed from office and from the civil-service rolls. [Applause on the Republican side.] The secrecy and air of mystery surrounding the issuance of this order and the cause for its issuance is far from creditable to those responsible for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] All of these officials have served the Government for many years. They had worked their way up by faithful, efficient service, from lower positions to responsible positions in the bureau, and so far as the public knows and believes no suspicion had ever attached to the good name or the record of any one of them. On the contrary, they enjoyed the confidence and respect of everyone who knew them.

This action in arbitrarily removing from their positions some of the most efficient and loyal officials of the bureau is nothing short of an outrage, and more especially so on account of the manner in which it was done. It is a sop of the rankest kind to certain malcontents in the bureau. Never before in the history of the civil service has a President taken wholesale action of this kind, and it was done without a hearing, without a word of warning, and without the slightest opportunity to be heard. This action may properly be described as "the shambles" of 1922. The dismissed officials left their desks on Friday at the close of business, and without a word or an intimation from any source that their services were to be dispensed with. They were not even aware that anything of the kind was under consideration.

While at their homes that evening they were notified by special messengers that they were no longer connected with the bureau, and the next morning they were humiliated by being told that they could not enter the doors of the bureau until after 10 o'clock, and then they were paced by watchmen of the bureau while they went for their personal belongings. Such methods would do credit to the methods employed by the disorganized régime in control in Russia. This action not only takes from these officials their jobs and salaries but it deprives them of all retirement privileges. Many of them had served a great number of years and would soon have reached the time when by age and length of service they would have been entitled to retire. I dare say that few, if any, of them have been able to accumulate much savings out of the salaries they have been drawing from the Government. And so, after they have given the best years of their lives to the Government, they are now compelled to go into private life and seek positions under the handicap of having no training or experience in private business. And all this was done by the President without giving them an opportunity to be heard or without even presenting a single reason for the action taken.

When these facts are considered and when it is remembered that most of them have families, the action taken can not be classed otherwise than arbitrary, cruel, and heartless. The reason assigned, "for the good of the service," may mean anything or nothing. If they were removed for political reasons and to give some of "the faithful" a good job, why not have been candid enough to frankly say so, and, if this be a fact, why remove them altogether from the civil-service rolls? I submit that every earmark of this order indicates it was a political move to reward those who have powerful political backing behind them.

The Evening Star, one of the most reliable papers published in Washington, Republican in policy, had this to say in its issue of yesterday afternoon concerning the visit of a Republican United States Senator from Oklahoma to the White House:

> He came to the White House to discuss patronage with the President, and when asked for an expression regarding the recent order bringing about the changes in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, he said that he was sure the President had acted wisely and that he had every reason for making changes in the manner he did, and that he sincerely hoped the President would not stop there. He said he had called the President's attention to more than one case of disloyal Democratic holdovers, and he hoped there would soon be a change of conditions, and that loyal and efficient Republicans would be found in all the key positions in the Government in Washington.

If the President wishes to put, as another paper expressed it, "Harding Republicans" in civil positions in Washington, he may, of course, do so, but the public may be pardoned for being a little skeptical of the claim that efficiency can only be found in a "Harding Republican." And I presume that this may be considered as a notice that all the other Republicans who just now seem to constitute a very large and increasing majority of their party need not apply for positions.

But what I protest against is the acceptance by the President of the ipse dixit of patronage-seeking Members of Congress, even though he be a United States Senator, that some official whose job he wants for one of his political henchmen is inefficient or disloyal, and without giving the man thus privately assailed an opportunity to be heard or even given notice of the accusation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Washington Post, the peculiar and personal organ of the President, yesterday morning had a labored article attempting to show that this was a move in the interest of efficiency and that politics had nothing to do with it. It was stated that Republicans as well as Democrats had been removed.

I have made inquiry, and I understand that there were a number of Republicans, possibly a majority, among those who were dismissed. The very fact that these officials were retained by the last administration as chiefs of divisions is conclusive proof that a Democratic administration did not play politics in the civil service. But it is significant that those Republicans had lived here for many years, and they were inactive Republicans, without powerful political backing behind them. This was, no doubt, the head and front of their offending, for I assume that their positions were desired by those who were active in the ranks. As a matter of fact, it can be said of all those dismissed, whether they profess to be Republicans or Democrats, that they really had no politics in a voting sense, because they have been here for many years and have lost their identity as voters in their former homes. This newspaper states that other dismissals are to follow in the interest of efficiency. Then the writer, thinking, perhaps, that some one might ask why the President has waited for 14 months before beginning his efficiency program, said that great efficiency had already been brought about, and with the ridiculous logic which is characteristic of his paper in defending this administration, cited the fact that the customs receipts for the month of March this year were greater in amount than they were a year ago. Until a sound and responsible explanation is offered, the public will with good reason believe that this was a purely political move, taken without regard to the plain, ordinary rights of those affected.

This fact is emphasized by newspaper publications to the effect that prominent Republican Members of Congress recently read the riot act to the Shipping Board, demanding that Democrats be replaced by Republicans and threatening to take the matter up on the floor of Congress if this was not done.

I have not the slightest objection to this administration taking the offices if it desires them. They are entitled to fill every place which is not of a civil-service nature with a Republican if they wish to do so. [Applause.] But what I do insist on is, if this be the object and purpose of this action, that the administration should deal frankly with the public and not seek to cover up its real motive at the expense of the reputation of the men who were dismissed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not yield. I have not the time.

If any of them have been guilty of conduct justifying removal, why was not the public so informed when the order was issued?

If such facts exist, which every one who knows these gentlemen seriously doubts, why were they not made public when the order was issued, for its issuance under the circumstances was a plain aspersion upon the character and good name of every man and woman who was dismissed. The order itself provides that those who were entitled by age and length of service to retirement shall be retired and not dismissed, which in itself shows that there were at least some of those who were dismissed who were not thought unworthy of being retired upon retirement pay. And yet the order in the manner in which it was issued, and in the intimations and statements published in the newspapers at the time, reflects upon every one of these men and women who have served in the bureau for so long a time and with such fidelity and efficiency.

The civil service law provides a method whereby a civil service employee may be removed. If they were incompetent or inefficient, which their service and promotion belies, the law provides for notice and opportunity to be heard before final action. It is utterly inconceivable that the President, in the face of the plain letter of the law and the plain dictates of justice and fairness to these officials, should have permitted himself to be made the instrument of a conspiring element in the bureau to bring about the removal of these men and women from the bureau.

The suspicion that politics was the underlying reason for this order which so flagrantly violates the civil service law is heightened by the fact that the new officials were given new titles. Was this an effort to mislead the public into the belief that the action was taken because of a reorganization of the bureau? It would appear so, because the old positions have not been abolished except by slight and unnecessary change of title.

Efficiency is not promoted by changing the title of chief clerk to that of chief accountant, or by calling the chief of a division a superintendent of division, or the custodian of dies, rolls, and plates a vault keeper, or by changing the title of foreman of plate cleaners to that of technical foreman of plate cleaners, and that of storekeeper to that of custodian of supplies. The whole thing smacks of a cheap subterfuge which was unworthy of the administration. What right did the President have to abolish by Executive order positions created by act of Congress and create new positions which he can fill without regard to civil service? What right has he to destroy the civil-service status of these officials by abolishing their offices? If he can do this, then no civil-service employee is safe.

I shall not have time to refer to the individual cases of these 31 men and women who were dismissed. I wish I had time to take up each individual case, for it would serve to show the gross injustice and the indefensible wrong which has been done to all of these men and women in arbitrarily dismissing them without giving them a moment's warning or a chance to be heard. Six of them are from New York; six from the District of Columbia; three from Massachusetts; three from Virginia; three from Maryland; two from Pennsylvania; two from Tennessee; one from Connecticut; one from Michigan; one from Arkansas; one from Missouri; and one from Iowa. I have known the director, Mr. Wilmeth, ever since I have been in Congress. He came here many years ago from Arkansas, and by his ability, zeal, and faithful attention to duty worked his way up from one of the lowest positions in the Treasury Department to that of chief clerk, and was finally appointed director of this big bureau. He has always enjoyed the respect and confidence of those who knew him. He is a Democrat, so it is said, and if the President wanted to appoint a Republican in his place, that was his right, and I would be one of the last to utter a complaint.

But the President should have been frank enough to say so, if this was the reason. On the other hand, if he has been guilty of conduct which justified his summary removal from the bureau, then those facts should have been given to the public. I wonder whether it was the intention first to dismiss the director, with the hope that possibly hereafter some cause might be found for such arbitrary action. Mr. Fisher, the assistant director, whose politics I do not know, enjoys an equally high reputation for integrity and efficiency.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Can the gentleman give me a little more time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is the gentleman aware that after the harm has been done a letter from the President was received this morning by one of the removed officials stating that the President regrets that the order should be construed as a reflection on the character and conduct of the officials?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am aware of it, and it only emphasizes the outrage of the action in this case. And it may also be said that the Secretary of the Treasury is quoted in the morning papers as having said that no charges involving the integrity of any of the retired officials had been filed. And yet they were removed under cover of the night and as if they had committed some crime against the Government.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not yield.

I have known Mr. E. H. Ashworth, the custodian of dies, rolls, and plates, for many years. He came here from Tennessee 28½ years ago to accept a position with the Government, and has given the best years of his life to the service. He is a gentleman of the highest character and splendid standing, and has proven his efficiency and devotion to duty during all these years. On the very day he was dismissed his accounts and official conduct had been approved, after having been carefully checked up according to law by the annual committee appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of taking an inventory and investigating the accounts and records in the vaults and comparing the record with those kept by the Comptroller of the Currency. I hold in my hand a copy of the report made by that committee, composed of Mr. T. H. Braden, chairman and representing the office of the Secretary, and by Mr. S. L. Hommedieu, the representative of the Comptroller of the Currency and the national banks, and Mr. John F. Green, a representative of the bureau appointed under the provisions of the law to investigate Mr. Ashworth's office. It reads as follows:

MARCH 31, 1922.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: Pursuant to and in compliance with the instructions of the department letter dated the 6th day of January, 1922, your committee, consisting of Messrs. T. H. Braden, Samuel L'Hommedieu, and John F. Green, appointed by said letter to examine the stock contained in the vault of the custodian of dies, rolls, and plates at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, have the honor to report that the said stock has been examined and checked, and your committee submits its report in triplicate herewith.

Each and every piece of stock, both engraved and otherwise, has been examined and checked by your committee and found to correspond to the records of the custodian of dies, rolls, and plates.

All the stock which had been canceled in the year 1921 was destroyed by your committee by causing the same to be melted in the furnaces at the navy yard, with the exception of 25 photo negatives, which because of their nature were destroyed at the bureau. The destroyed material consisted of 16,214 pieces and weighed 147,330 pounds. The total stock examined and accounted for was 98,224 pieces.

Your committee regrets that it found several discrepancies in the records of the comptroller's office, which were corrected in accordance with the actual plates found in the vault and made to conform to the records of the custodian.

Your committee is grateful to both the officials and employees of the bureau alike for the many courtesies shown it and for the splendid cooperation and aid rendered it while engaged in its duties.

Respectfully,

(Signed) T. H. BRADEN, Chairman.
S. L'HOMMEDIEU,
JOHN F. GREEN.

That report was made to the Secretary of the Treasury at 4.30 o'clock on March 31, and at 6.45 in the evening of the same day the President, in consultation—so the papers tell us—with the Attorney General and the Comptroller of the Currency, signed an order dismissing Mr. Ashworth for the good of the service.

The Comptroller of the Currency was with President Harding when the Executive order was signed. If there was inefficiency in Mr. Ashworth's office, it must have developed after he left work that day, and one of the two men who advised with the President for Mr. Ashworth's dismissal stands convicted by the report of an administration committee, on which he was represented, of "discrepancies" in the records of his own office, which had to be corrected by Mr. Ashworth's record. I submit that under that report, if the President was honestly seeking efficiency, he should have dismissed the Comptroller of the Currency rather than Mr. Ashworth, the custodian of dies, rolls, and plates. And in doing that he would have simply been removing an appointive officer, a man appointed by him, and it would not have been necessary to violate the plain letter of the civil service law, as was done when Mr. Ashworth and these other officials were removed.

The same may be said of the character and standing of Dr. E. L. Beech, the storekeeper, who also came from Tennessee. [Applause.] If the President desired some Republican whose appointment was being pressed by some Senator or Congressman to fill these positions, that is all right; but if this be true, why dismiss them from the civil service rolls and deprive them of their retirement privileges, for which they would have been very shortly eligible?

Mr. George U. Rose, jr., a native of the city of Washington, chief of the engraving division of the bureau, and a gentleman of the highest character and standing, has labored conscientiously in the bureau for 39 years. He took a firm stand as chief of the engraving division against inefficiency and rottenness and fought the element now in control. Some of these very people, openly defying efforts to reform conditions, have been conspiring to get his scalp, and they have finally succeeded, after a secret ex parte investigation, and been promoted themselves in the process.

Why, gentlemen, there were five ex-service men included in this dismissal order of the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Please give me five minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I regret very much that I have not the time, unless some gentleman who has had time promised to him will yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman give him five minutes of the time he had promised me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I did not know that I had promised the gentleman any time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I understood the gentleman to say that I would be recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee five minutes additional.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The names of these ex-service men are Mr. Wilson, who served his country overseas, and who was occupying the position of chief of the photolithographic section; Mr. Chappell, a Spanish War veteran, who was chief of the engineering and machine division; Mr. Slattery, a World War veteran, chief of the electrolytic section; Mr. Farrell, a Spanish-American War veteran, who was foreman of the building; and Mr. Chamberlin, foreman of the garage, a Spanish War veteran who is now drawing a small pension on account of disabilities incurred while serving his country during that war. These five war veterans have been summarily and arbitrarily dismissed without previous notice or an opportunity to show why such action should not be taken, and in the face of the reported declaration of the President as to his great admiration and his great desire to do justice to ex-service men. [Applause.]

The removal of these officials was an outrage on decency. It was a blow to administrative discipline. It is a strike at governmental efficiency. It is an under-the-belt, knock-out blow at economy and morale. It is a grave injustice. It is an arbitrary and tyrannical rebuke to conscientious effort without a hearing, without a word of warning, without an opportunity to be heard in an ex parte proceeding, such as no decent court would sponsor, these officials, who have given up their lives, who have sacrificed their blood and sinew, as well as their brain and skill to the Government, who have sacrificed time that others took for vacation in order to carry on for the Government in war time, have been cut off without a moment's warning.

The reason for their dismissal and that of the other officials should not be left to speculation. Man is powerless to clear himself of charges raised by innuendo, and it is not in keeping with fairness and fair play to put these men under suspicion unless there is a clear justification for it.

The same paper, the Evening Star, to which I have heretofore referred, also had this to say:

> One explanation, which comes from confidential sources to-day, of the radical steps taken by the Executive is this: That since the beginning of the war approximately fifty billions in securities have been turned out by the bureau, including bonds, currency, Treasury notes, internal revenue and other stamps, and all paper handled by the office, and that the transactions involved have never been audited.
> It is suggested that it would be inadvisable to audit them in the presence of and with participation by the officials and employees concerned, and that while not charging that anything is wrong, it was deemed advisable to make a change in personnel while the auditing proceeds.
> The statement is made that the Government does not indicate that aught is amiss, but that caution admonishes an auditing and accounting under the strictest conditions and surroundings.
> It is thought that comment upon this viewpoint may suggest that the personnel could have been suspended, without prejudice, during the auditing, without being dismissed, in circumstances which it is claimed will work hardship and are calculated to work injustice.
> So keen is the feeling in Congress upon the subject, and especially in the Senate, where the incident is likely to be further commented upon, that several Republican Senators to-day set on foot anxious inquiries directed to high sources to be more adequately informed upon the facts in the case.

Just how the incumbency of these officials would prevent a bona fide audit by an independent bureau of the Government it is difficult to understand. But even if this was true, why were they not, as suggested, temporarily suspended, without prejudice, during the progress of the audit, unless it be that there were those who wanted their places and were backed by such powerful political influence as to compel a disregard of their rights? And it may be asked, if it is found by the audit that everything is correct, how is this egregious wrong done to these faithful and honest officials ever to be righted? They have lost not only their jobs, the living for themselves and families, but an unwarranted and unjustified reflection has been cast upon them by the unprecedented and ruthless action taken.

The public should know whether this is the beginning of an insidious attack on the civil service. If the civil service laws and regulations are to be disregarded and civil service employees are to be dismissed without hearing and without even an explanation except the very general, indefinite, and misleading statement that it is "for the good of the civil service," then no civil service employee, high or low, whatever may be his record, can feel safe under this administration unless he is backed by powerful political support. The Attorney General several days ago offered some very severe criticisms of the civil service. From his statement we are certainly justified in believing that he is hostile to the civil service and that he would, if he could have his way, return to the old spoils system of choosing even the minor clerks in his department. The newspapers tell us that he was one of two high officials who were present and advising with the President when this order was signed at 6.45 o'clock on Friday evening. It is singular that the head of the Treasury Department, in which this bureau is located, and none of his assistants were reported to have been present at this conference. Is the country to be left to understand that the President indorses the sentiments of the Attorney General? Without reference to the merits of the civil service, the country is certainly entitled to know, and in the interest of ordinary and common decency and simple justice these dismissed officials are entitled to know just why they have been separated from the service. [Applause.] The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] has introduced a resolution, which I understand has been referred to the Committee on Rules, asking that an investigation be made by a special committee to be appointed by the Speaker as to just what these officials have done and just what were the reasons for their dismissal.

I hope that the majority will be fair enough to these men and these women who have served their country so faithfully, and to these ex-veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War, to permit that resolution to be reported out and adopted, so that the country may know just why this action was taken. [Applause.]

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. CLOUSE. The gentleman has been speaking of ex-service men. I recall a case that occurred over at Nashville, Tenn., some three years ago in appointing a postmaster, where an ex-service man stood at the top of the list, but an astute politician in the person of Charles McCabe was appointed postmaster. I wonder if the gentleman indorsed Mr. McCabe or the ex-service man.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that I did not indorse Mr. McCabe, but, on the contrary, I did everything in my power, as several gentlemen on this floor know, among them the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], to bring about the appointment of Mr. Webster, the ex-service man. [Applause.] I repeatedly urged his appointment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman from Tennessee always believes in clean and efficient government. He has made a very fine defense of some of the men who were removed from office.

If it should later develop that any of these men were removed from office because of neglect of their official duties or such grave misconduct as would occasion great financial loss, the gentleman from Tennessee would not attack that action?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly I would not. But the letter of the President and the statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury clearly refute any such suggestion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 8815. An act to amend the act of March 1, 1921 (41 Stat. p. 1202), entitled "An act to authorize certain homestead settlers or entrymen who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Germany to make final proof of their entries";

H. R. 7870. An act for the relief of I. C. Johnson, jr.;

H. R. 8832. An act to provide for the exchange of certain lands of the United States in the Tahoe National Forest, Calif., for lands owned by William Kent;

H. R. 2558. An act for the relief of Richard P. McCullough; and

H. J. Res. 257. Joint resolution to appoint a commission for the exchange of sites for a post-office and courthouse building at New York between the Federal Government and the officials of the city of New York.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1945. An act to reimburse the Navajo Timber Co. of Delaware for a deposit made to cover the purchase of timber;

S. 3083. An act authorizing the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to construct an elevated railroad siding adjacent to its tracks in the city of Washington;

S. 288. An act for the relief of John T. Eaton;

S. 1087. An act for the relief of H. L. McFarlin;

S. 2992. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish certain information for historical purposes to the adjutants general of the several States and the District of Columbia, and making an appropriation therefor;

S. 534. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910, as amended by an act approved January 23, 1913;

S. 3156. An act to change the terms of the district court for the northern division of the southern district of Alabama; and

S. 289. An act for the relief of Kate Canniff.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND JUSTICE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1923.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, during the debate yesterday on the conference report, particularly on the item relating to salaries of certain officials of the Shipping Board, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], in charge of the conference report on the minority side, stated that so far as he knew no salaries had ever been paid to Government officials as high as $35,000. I stated at the time that my impression was that certain officials of the railroads in the last administration were paid as high, if not higher, salaries. The gentleman from Virginia thought that statement was not accurate. I find on investigation that it was entirely accurate. I read from the statement of the comptroller of the railroads as to the salaries in force on May 31, 1919.

The regional director of the eastern region received a salary of $50,000. The assistant regional director and the district director of the eastern region each received a salary of $35,000. The regional director of the Allegheny region received a salary of $50,000.

The regional director of the Pocahontas region received a salary of $40,000. The regional director of the southern region received a salary of $40,000. The regional director of the northwestern region received a salary of $50,000. The regional director of the central western region received a salary of $50,000. The regional director of the southwestern region received a salay of $50,000.

In other words, there were nine Government officials a very few years ago who were receiving as high or higher salaries than those complained of now. I simply state that in order that the country may be informed and will understand that the salaries being paid now are not unprecedented in recent years. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would if I had the time.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 21 minutes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED], as usual, has made a very careful and analytical report of the bill. I notice, however, on page 25 that for the bringing home of criminals—for the actual expenses incurred in bringing home criminals from foreign countries, persons charged with crime—there is an appropriation of only $2,000. On page 43 of the same bill I notice that there is another item at the end of the paragraph for penal institutions, line 22, the following:

Expenses incurred in pursuing and identifying escaped prisoners and for rewards for their capture, $90,000.

I am very sorry, indeed, that there is not at this time any probability of expending any part of either of these amounts of money in bringing home that arch slacker, Grover Cleveland Bergdoll.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. The $90,000 item covers very many other objects than that mentioned by the gentleman from California.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I understand that even though the item of $90,000 would cover other items, no part can be expended for bringing home Bergdoll inasmuch as he was never committed to the Federal prison at Fort Leavenworth. Many Members of this House remember that early in the last session the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, the Hon. JULIUS KAHN, introduced a resolution reported to the House on the 18th of April, 1921, House Resolution 12, which authorized an investigation of the escape of this nationally famed slacker, whom I trust will soon be apprehended and brought home to justice.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The difficulty about bringing him home is that you have got to catch him first.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I expect to touch upon that shortly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I hope the gentleman will.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Let me read the resolution which I shall insert in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Whereas one Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, recently convicted by Army general court-martial as a draft deserter and sentenced to confinement for five years in the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Jay, N. Y., has escaped from confinement; and

Whereas charges are made, and there is reason to believe, that a plot and conspiracy existed among and between divers and sundry persons, unknown, to consummate the escape of the said Bergdoll from confinement under his said sentence: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a select committee of five Members of the House be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate and procure all facts relevant to fixing responsibility for said escape and for the failure to recapture the said Bergdoll, and particularly to determine whether relatives, friends, counsel, or attorneys of the said Bergdoll participated in a plot or conspiracy to effect or give aid to said escape or to prevent recapture; or whether officers, noncommissioned officers, or privates of the Army or other persons connected with the Army or with the administration of the said disciplinary barracks or any other person participated in a plot or conspiracy to effect or give aid to said escape or to prevent recapture or were derelict in the performance of any duty devolved or devolving upon them which contributed to making said escape possible or prevented or hindered recapture or made it more easy for the said Bergdoll to elude recapture.

That the committee so appointed may conduct such investigation by subcommittee or otherwise, may hold sessions during the recess of the House, may employ whatever assistance, either clerical or legal, it may deem necessary to aid in conducting said investigation, may administer oaths, may summon and compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers and documents, may employ a stenographer or stenographers to report the same, and have the reports of said hearings printed for use.

That any and all expenses in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee and by the Committee on Accounts: Provided, The expenses of said investigation shall not exceed the sum of $10,000.

That said committee shall report its findings to the House at the earliest possible date, together with such recommendations as it shall deem pertinent and advisable.

As the House well knows, some of the most distinguished Members of the House were appointed on that committee. John A. Peters, of Maine, no longer a Member of the House, was appointed chairman. CLIFTON N. MCARTHUR of Oregon, OSCAR LUHRING of Indiana, the late lamented and distinguished Member of the House, Henry D. Flood of Virginia, and BEN JOHNSON of Kentucky. On further investigation we find that this committee on the 18th of August last filed a report, No. 354, which contains a majority and minority report.

Upon further investigation we find that that report now lies in that shrouded mausoleum of bills, the House Calendar, and the Lord only knows when it will come up. There is no question but that the people of this country are very much interested in knowing what action this House proposes to take upon the recommendations set forth in that report. I find that very definite recommendations were made by the majority members signing the report. On page 33 I quote as follows:

> While there are many who participated in the conspiracy leading to Bergdoll's escape and the acquittal of those who brought it about, there are three who are infinitely more culpable than the rest. Those three are General Ansell, Colonel Hunt, and Col. C. C. Creeson. But thus far no punishment has been imposed upon anybody that could not be discharged by the Bergdoll millions, and counted a mere trifle.
> General Ansell is now out of the Army. He is beyond the jurisdiction of court-martial proceedings, but provision should be made against his future practice before any of the departments, before any court-martial, or in the courts of the District of Columbia or the Nation above whose safety and integrity he has placed gold.
> Colonel Hunt, within the next two months after he had participated so criminally in the escape of Bergdoll, was promoted from major to colonel and immediately retired on the pay of $3,600 a year. It becomes a serious question who is to pay this lifelong reward for his perfidy. Those whose backs already are burdened with the most onerous tax ever imposed must contribute; and, in addition, more than 4,000,000 of our soldier boys must, throughout Colonel Hunt's remaining years, contribute to this munificent retirement fund in recognition only of his instrumentality in this national tragedy. An outraged Nation has the right to demand that Colonel Hunt's annuity be discontinued.

Gentlemen of the House, I am not here to discuss the merits or the demerits of the recommendations made in this report. I simply desire to bring to your attention the fact that certain definite recommendations have been made upon the part of the majority membership. Referring now to the report of the minority membership of that committee, on page 51, I find the following:

> The $5,000 retainer paid Ansell & Bailey was payment for legal services and probably had no influence on the part played by Messrs. Ansell & Bailey in making possible the treasure hunt which led to the eventual escape.

That is one of the conclusions reached by the minority, which would seem at least to not discredit or impugn the motives of Ansell so far as his interest in accepting this fee was concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. As I understand it the gentleman is simply insisting that this report be brought before the House for action at once, as soon as it can be reached, and is not interested in the conclusion as to the guilt or innocence of anyone. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LINEBERGER. The gentleman is partially correct, inasmuch as I am not drawing any personal conclusions in the matter at all. I am simply quoting from the report itself, and trying to impress upon the House the necessity of bringing the matter up at the earliest possible moment. Naturally, I desire to see justice meted out to everyone guilty in this national tragedy of errors, which has well-nigh become a national disgrace.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that I am in hearty accord with him upon that. I believe some action ought to be taken looking to a decision of the House upon the questions involved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What action could the House take on this report?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Inexperienced as I am in parliamentary matters, it would seem to me that after consideration and debate of the reports rendered by the majority and the minority membership of that committee, it would be proper for this House to pass a resolution recommending, if it saw fit, certain action on the part of the War Department, with a view to carrying out certain recommendations to which it might desire to commit itself or of those of one or the other of these reports.

Mr. MANN. The committee did not report any resolution, did it?

Mr. LINEBERGER. The committee has not reported a resolution, but the majority did make certain recommendations in its report.

Mr. MANN. If a resolution were introduced under the rules, would it not have to go to another committee of the House for consideration?

Mr. LINEBERGER. It would, but it is very unlikely that a resolution of any kind whatever will be introduced until the report itself is debated upon the floor of the House. I first want to get the report off the shelf, where it has been so peacefully reposing for the past eight months. I hope the gentleman from Illinois now understands what I am driving at.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman introduce a resolution which he thinks ought to be passed and have it referred to the appropriate committee, and see if the committee will report it out?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Because I desire that this report be brought up on the floor of the House and debated, so that the merits or the demerits of the report may be ascertained by the House, and I have no doubt that if the majority report is sustained after debate that such a resolution will be introduced either by myself or some other Member.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me for taking up his time, if we could have the report brought up and have somebody talk about it for some time as we do here in general debate and it would end there, then there would be nothing that the House could do.

Mr. LINEBERGER. But it is entirely proper for the House to pass a subsequent resolution making certain recommendations based on the report, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be correct, though I doubt whether the House can pass a resolution which has not been introduced without having it referred to the appropriate committee for consideration. Such a resolution can be introduced by any member.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I do not think the gentleman will question in the least that the people of the country, the patriotic American people who sent 4,500,000 of their sons out to fight the battles of this Nation in 1917–18, are very much interested in knowing the real facts in this iniquitious Bergdoll matter.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think the country would learn the real facts because a few Members talked for four or five hours on the report here some afternoon?

Mr. LINEBERGER. They would be as likely to learn the real facts from a discussion of that kind as they are from some of the other discussions that I have heard on the floor of this House, in which various gentlemen, including the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, have taken part.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What does the gentleman think of the proposition of introducing a resolution of inquiry asking the department or the President to state what steps, if any, have been taken by the proper department of the Government?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I am not here to dictate to the House. I do think this report ought to be brought up here and debated in the open before the country. The people of the United States want action on this thing, and they are not pleased by having it set aside on the inactive House Calendar, where it will probably never be brought up. What we want is action. If the men who fought the battles of this country in the World War had spent their time in delaying and further delaying matters, the war would never have been won. What we want is some action on this matter.

It has been placed on the House Calendar, and I have no desire whatever to lecture or to censure the Members of the House or the Speaker of the House or anybody else connected with the matter, but what I want is to see that justice is satisfied. And justice will never be satisfied until this matter is gone over from top to bottom. The American people are not going to stand for any whitewashing in this matter. If these gentlemen are guilty, Congress should make certain recommendations and publish them to the country, as far as it may be possible to do so. If they are not guilty, they should be cleared for all time of the charges and the insinuations which are carried in the majority report.

I was very sorry indeed at the time this committee was named that there was not at least one ex-service man placed upon it. I have never believed, nor do I believe now, in group or bloc representation in the House of Representatives, particularly so far as ex-soldiers are concerned.

Every man who is here and who incidentally served his country during the time of war has enough of honor in his inner consciousness of duty performed, but I do believe, in a vital matter of this kind, that the experience and knowledge of some ex-service men should have been brought to bear upon the investigation. I do not make that statement with a view of criticizing any of the gentlemen who formed the committee of five.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. KAHN, specifically requested several times that an ex-service man be appointed as a member of the Bergdoll committee. Does the gentleman know any particular reason that made the Speaker of the House so insistent in prohibiting any ex-service man being on that committee?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I do not. I heard the same thing at the time, and Mr. KAHN, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and dean of the California delegation, told me personally he would make such a request. However, the Speaker saw fit to do otherwise, and was acting entirely within his prerogatives in so doing. After he named the committee I did not criticize him, nor do I seek to do so at this time. I am sorry that no ex-service man or men were included in the Speaker's nominations for this important committee.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I will.

Mr. FISH. I remember that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] requested that all members be ex-service men.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Be that as it may, I do not know whether or not that would have facilitated the discussion of this report after it was rendered.

I hope, gentlemen, that in the very near future, by some means or other, the gentleman in charge of getting this report onto the floor of this House will see that it is resurrected from the mausoleum where it lies, and that it be brought on the floor of this House, and that sufficient time will be given for thorough and intelligent debate. And I think that after such debate has been had, the gentlemen who are charged, by inference at least, will have a chance through their friends and those who view the matter from the opposite side of the situation to clear their skirts. At least, the American people and the ex-service men of the Nation, I assure you, are desirous of having this matter thrashed out and thrashed out at the earliest possible moment. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the rest of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I insert herewith the report of the committee.

[House Report No. 354, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session.]

ESCAPE OF GROVER CLEVELAND BERGDOLL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, from the Select Committee to Investigate the Escape of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, submitted the following report:

On the 18th day of April, 1921, the House of Representatives adopted House Resolution 12, reading as follows:

"Whereas one Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, recently convicted by Army general court-martial as a draft deserter and sentenced to confinement for five years in the United States disciplinary barracks at Fort Jay, N. Y., has escaped from confinement; and

"Whereas charges are made, and there is reason to believe, that a plot and conspiracy existed among and between divers and sundry persons unknown to consummate the escape of the said Bergdoll from confinement under his said sentence: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That a select committee of five Members of the House be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate and procure all facts relevant to fixing responsibility for said escape and for the failure to recapture the said Bergdoll, and particularly to determine whether relatives, friends, counsel, or attorneys of the said Bergdoll participated in a plot or conspiracy to effect or give aid to said escape or to prevent recapture; or whether officers, noncommissioned officers, or privates of the Army or other persons connected with the Army or with the administration of the said disciplinary barracks or any other person participated in a plot or conspiracy to effect or give aid to said escape or to prevent recapture or were derelict in the performance of any duty devolved or devolving upon them which contributed to making said escape possible or prevented or hindered recapture or made it more easy for the said Bergdoll to elude recapture.

"That the committee so appointed may conduct such investigation by subcommittee or otherwise, may hold sessions during the recess of the House, may employ whatever assistance, either clerical or legal, it may deem necessary to aid in conducting said investigation, may administer oaths, may summon and compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers and documents, may employ a stenographer or stenographers to report the same, and have the reports of said hearings printed for use.

"That any and all expenses in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee and by the Committee on Accounts: Provided, The expenses of said investigation shall not exceed the sum of $10,000.

"The said committee shall report its findings to the House at the earliest possible date, together with such recommendations as it shall deem pertinent and advisable."

Under that resolution the Speaker appointed the following special committee: Messrs. John A. Peters, Maine; Clifton W. McArthur, Oregon; Oscar R. Luhring, Indiana; Henry D. Flood, Virginia; and Ben Johnson, Kentucky.

The committee held hearings on April 29, May 2, 3, 4, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19, 23, and 24, and again on July 19, 22, 23, and 25, the latter hearings being for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of Maj. Bruce R. Campbell. From the evidence and testimony given in those hearings the following report is made by the undersigned, a majority of the committee, to the House of Representatives:

A very brief statement of the case under investigation is as follows:

Grover C. Bergdoll, now about 28 years of age, was subject to the draft made during the recent World War. He evaded the draft, became a fugitive as a slacker, and continued such for something more than a year and a half. During that time he was in the United States, and frequently sent taunting and defiant letters to the highest authorities of our Government. His residence was in Philadelphia.

After the armistice was declared young Bergdoll returned to Philadelphia; and, it seems, spent at least a part of his time at his residence there. Just prior to January 7, 1920, the authorities received information to the effect that for several weeks he had been at one or the other of some four or five residences in or near Philadelphia. On the morning of the 7th of January, 1920, officers went to each of these residences, surrounded them, and made search of the several premises.

When the officers went to the residence owned by Grover C. Bergdoll, his mother refused them admittance, although the officers had a search warrant with them, and so told her. After spending considerable time endeavoring to get into the house, one of the officers placed his pistol against the door lock and shot it off. When, in this way, they had gained entrance into the house they were confronted by Mrs. Bergdoll, who held them off with an automatic pistol. However, they managed to get that away from her and then proceeded to search the house. When every part of the house had been searched and they were about to leave without finding Bergdoll, one of the party lifted up the top of a small window seat and found Bergdoll concealed therein, although it seemed next to impossible for a man of his size to get into such small space.

When Bergdoll had come out of the window box he was handcuffed to one of the officers, and another of the officers kept the key to the handcuffs. In this manner he was transported to Governors Island at New York, where the Government had a military disciplinary prison in charge of Maj. John E. Hunt. In due course of time he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment for violating the draft laws.

Under usual circumstances he would have been sent immediately to Fort Leavenworth, Kans., to begin serving his term. However, under one pretext or another, his being sent to Leavenworth was deferred. On May 20, 1920, he was permitted to leave the prison at Governors Island, accompanied by a guard composed of two sergeants, for the alleged purpose of going into the mountains of western Maryland to secure something more than $100,000 in gold which he claimed to have buried there. When he reached Philadelphia on that pretended mission he made his escape, drove through the country in an automobile, accompanied by one Ike Stecker, to the Canadian line, there abandoned the automobile, and went to Winnipeg, Canada. At that place, by false representations, he secured passports for himself and Stecker to London, from which place they found their way to Paris and thence into Germany, where, according to the best information, they still are.

Shortly after Bergdoll's incarceration at Governors Island it was urged that he was of unsound mind, and therefore should be released. However, he was declared to be of sound mind.

Next, habeas corpus proceedings were instituted for the purpose of securing his release. The writ of habeas corpus failed to bring his release. Having been convicted, and both the insanity plea and the habeas corpus proceeding having failed, some other means of securing his escape had to be resorted to.

Until that time D. C. Gibboney, of Philadelphia, was chief counsel for Bergdoll. It is generally conceded that Gibboney was not much of a lawyer, but more of a practical manager for better lawyers. It is in evidence, and undisputed, that Gibboney, representing Bergdoll, sought to employ Judge John W. Westcott, a very eminent New Jersey lawyer. Westcott denies vigorously that he ever accepted the employment, while Gen. Samuel Tilden Ansell and his partner, Edward S. Bailey, testified emphatically to the contrary.

It is admitted that Judge Westcott wrote a letter to the Secretary of War stating that he—Westcott—was "enormously" interested in Bergdoll's court-martial trial, and would be glad to have the Secretary of War give his personal attention to the case. The Secretary of War courteously replied, but said that the case had not come to his personal attention, and would not unless it reached him through the regular course of business.

It is also admitted that upon a certain occasion Gibboney gave Judge Westcott a $1,000 bill in payment of "a" fee. Judge Westcott denied that it was in payment of any fee on account of any employment by Bergdoll, stating that it was in payment of other employments.

Mrs. Bergdoll testified that at one time she paid Gibboney $10,000 in currency. While she would not state that she ever gave Gibboney a $1,000 bill, she did state that she kept large sums of money in her house, and that upon different occasions she had had many $1,000 bills. Putting those circumstances together it is possible that the $1,000 bill which Judge Westcott received was paid to Gibboney by Mrs. Bergdoll and then by Gibboney to Judge Westcott, but not necessarily on account of Bergdoll.

After Bergdoll had finally escaped and had fled the country the grand jury was about to meet in Philadelphia for the purpose of returning indictments against all those engaged in the conspiracy through which Bergdoll escaped. Either just prior to the meeting of the grand jury or during their sittings Judge Westcott wrote a letter to the Attorney General of the United States confidently expressing the opinion that Gibboney was as innocent of any part in the conspiracy as an unborn child.

That letter was forwarded by the Attorney General to the district attorney at Philadelphia. Gibboney was not indicted.

The law firm of Ansell & Bailey was employed in April, 1920, by Gibboney to represent Bergdoll in an effort to have the court-martial conviction reversed or set aside.

As already stated, both Ansell and Bailey testified that Westcott was counsel, but only in "an advisory capacity," or as "advisor of Mr. Gibboney." General Ansell fell out with Judge Westcott over this question and quit speaking to him because of differences in their statements concerning it. But their falling out has nothing to do with the real issue in the case. Westcott contended for none of Ansell's fee. He merely declined to claim any of the honors (?) accompanying the victory won, not through the courts but through the gold-hunting expedition.

For the purposes of this investigation it is not deemed important whether Judge Westcott was a regularly employed and paid counsel for Bergdoll, or whether as a friend to Gibboney he merely was counseling him. But it can not be disputed that he was acting in either one or the other of those capacities. Neither is it considered important whether General Ansell knew in which of these two capacities Judge Westcott was acting, as General Ansell could have made and did make the same use of Judge Westcott regardless of the capacity in which he was acting.

It is interesting to know that General Ansell, until a short time before his employment in the Bergdoll case, had been an officer in the Regular Army of the United States for about 25 years; and that during the war he was the next officer in authority to General Crowder, the Judge Advocate General. However, during the war General Crowder was more directly concerned and employed in preparing and executing the draft law, thus virtually leaving General Ansell as the Judge Advocate General.

At the time above indicated General Ansell resigned from the Army and associated himself with the law firm of Ansell & Bailey, making a specialty of military law.

Somebody conceived the idea of concentrating Gibboney's cunning and energy, Westcott's influence with the then administration, and Ansell's standing with the Army officials into one general scheme of defense or escape. Each of these three agencies—purposely or unwittingly—was effectively and concertedly at work at the same time on either one or both of these two propositions.

It was known to Gibboney, Westcott, and Ansell that during the preceding October and November Mrs. Emma C. Bergdoll, the mother of the draft dodger, had, in full compliance with law, exchanged $105,000 in currency for that amount in gold at the Treasury of the United States, which gold she claims to have buried. It must be that the mind of one or more of the attorneys just mentioned turned to Mrs. Bergdoll's alleged buried gold, and, upon that story, built the one to which reference is made in a letter sent by General Ansell to Adjutant General Harris, dated Tuesday, May 11, 1920. That story was not used by any of the Bergdoll attorneys, nor did it have any semblance of plausibility until General Ansell was employed in the case, nor until it had been colored and recolored by his fertile imagination.

It is admitted that General Ansell called upon Adjutant General Harris in the afternoon of May 11, 1920, and that later that afternoon, at his office, dictated a letter to Adjutant General Harris relative to the conversation which they had just had about Bergdoll's release. That letter as dictated seems not to have been sufficiently strong for General Ansell's purposes. Consequently he directed Miss Sisson, his stenographer, not to typewrite the letter until the next morning. General Ansell that night, at his home, with lead pencil, wrote out another letter. Next morning that was typewritten by Miss Sisson, signed by General Ansell—not by the firm of Ansell & Bailey—and sent to The Adjutant General.

Miss Sisson, the stenographer, preserved her shorthand notes of the letter dictated on the afternoon of May 11, 1920. That letter was not sent. In her testimony before the committee she read those notes and reduced them to typewritten copy, reading as follows:

"MAY 11, 1920.

"MY DEAR GENERAL HARRIS: I wish to confirm, in this informal way, the statement I made to you a few moments ago orally in support of the request that I am making of you and the Secretary of War. I am counsel for Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, a so-called draft deserter, now in imprisonment at Fort Jay pending the review of his case by the War Department. Bergdoll is represented in Philadelphia by Mr. D. C. Gibboney, a gentleman of the highest standing in that city and a lawyer of unquestioned probity. Judge Westcott, formerly attorney general of New Jersey, and who doubtless is well and favorably known to Mr. Baker, is a consulting counsel in the case and adviser of Mr. Gibboney.

"Last Friday Mr. Gibboney, accompanied by Judge Westcott, came to my office and conferred with me about a situation concerning young Bergdoll's property, which was so strange that the truth of it, under normal circumstances, would hardly justify belief. In view of the fact that Mr. Gibboney believes Bergdoll's statement to be true, and in view of the numerous circumstances tending to support it, I myself believed it to be credible and such as to justify counsel in making of the department this present request.

"This young man has unquestionably inherited a very considerable property from his father. He has not heretofore developed that sense of responsibility required for the care and proper use of a large sum of money. I understand that the control and influence of his mother have not tended to the development of an adequate sense of responsibility in such matters. I am advised also that there have been family difficulties which seem to have produced a desire in this young man to get a physical control over his property, ungoverned by the other members of the family.

"The motive for his action was probably complex and not easily understood, but I am advised that at different times he took two large sums of money in gold coin and placed them in large metal containers; one, I am advised, he left with some person in western Maryland. This has been recovered. The other, Bergdoll states, he took, all alone, and buried it in an out-of-the-way place on some mountain side, at a place within a day's railway travel from this city. This sum amounts to about $150,000 gold coin. He is quite unable to direct Mr. Gibboney or me how to find it, and, of course, assuming his statement to be true, it can be found only by him in person. He is now thoroughly perturbed with the apprehension that he may never recover it and is intensely anxious to be permitted to go with counsel and under guard to find it. He wishes to recover it and turn it over to some proper custodian for safe-keeping and investment.

"And such is my request. Upon all the facts before me, it seemed entirely reasonable to me, and so it seemed to you. I hope and believe it will seem so to the Secretary. I do not desire to ask the privilege, but only that which is necessary for this man to conserve what is his. There can be no danger of escape. The department will, of course, send such guard as it sees fit, and all expenses will be borne by us. In addition, I shall hold myself, as counsel, responsible for the safe return of this prisoner to his place of confinement and that no advantage will be taken of such leave as is granted other than that which is the object of this request.

"May I ask that this communication, for the time being, will be kept within the knowledge of you and the Secretary alone, and may I ask you to take it up at your very earliest convenience with Mr. Baker and let me know the result?

"With very kindest regards, I am,

"Very sincerely yours."

The general tenor of the above letter, which was not sent to General Harris, should, by all means, be compared with the one which was sketched out that night with lead pencil, and which was sent the next day to General Harris. The charges made were most adroit and clever; were not authorized by other counsel in the case whose names were used; in some instances were not warranted by the facts.

The letter actually sent reads as follows:

ANSELL & BAILEY, ATTORNEYS AT LAW,
SUITES 710–712, RIGGS BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., May 11, 1920.

MY DEAR GENERAL HARRIS: Please permit me, in compliance with your helpful suggestion of a moment ago, to place before you in this manner my request, concerning which I have just spoken to you, in behalf of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, together with a brief statement of the reasons therefor.

This man, in virtue of his conviction and sentence as a so-called "draft deserter," is now imprisoned at Fort Jay pending the review of his trial by the War Department. I am his attorney. His home counsel in Philadelphia is Mr. D. C. Gibboney, of unexcelled repute as a man and a lawyer. Of counsel also, in a consulting capacity, is Judge Westcott, of New Jersey, whom doubtless the Secretary well knows. These gentlemen visited me last Friday and related to me a situation which we believe to be true and which impels us to submit this request.

This young man was reared fatherless under family conditions which, even when partially revealed, threw considerable light upon conduct of his that, to say the least, is strange if not unintelligible. From the father he inherited wealth. Apprehending the family desire to control his share, he at times has openly submitted and at others has become secretive of his wealth. This latter perhaps is the most influential of the many complex motives for his actions in the instance I now speak of. In any event, it is now known that he did secrete one large sum of money, which was recovered a year or so ago. He now declares that he also hid a second large sum, the remainder of his fortune ($150,000), in a lonely spot on a mountain side, distant about a day's journey from this city; that he placed the gold coin in a metallic container and took it himself, unaccompanied, and hid it in a spot which he alone can identify. Circumstances indicate the truth of his statement.

He is now wrought up with fear and anxiety lest he may never recover the money, and accordingly earnestly asks me, other counsel joining him, to endeavor to arrange it that he may go, under guard and with his counsel, to recover the money and place it in safe-keeping, all expense to be borne by us.

We are requesting no privilege, only the necessary liberty of action, under guard. This prisoner has no desire to escape, nor could he if he wanted to. Notwithstanding the guard, as his counsel I stand responsible for his prompt return to prison, without advantage to him other than that involved in the object of his request.

I hope this request may be granted immediately. It seems reasonable and right to me, and also to you, and I hope—and doubt not—that it will seem so to the Secretary.

May I ask prompt action upon this request? May I also ask that, if possible, knowledge of the contents of this communication, for obvious reasons, be confined to you and the Secretary, and, further, that you notify me personally at the first practicable moment after you have decided upon this request?

With kind regards for your many courtesies, I am,

Sincerely,

S. T. ANSELL.

The purpose of these changes is obvious when the two papers are compared and the end to be accomplished considered.

In the first sentence of the letter, which was not sent and which afterwards was pruned and put into more seductive form, he made the request of both General Harris "and" the Secretary of War, while the letter which was actually sent used this language:

"It seems reasonable and right to me, and also to you, and I hope—and doubt not—that it will seem so to the Secretary."

If the letter had been sent as first written, it would have been necessary that the request go to the Secretary of War. The second letter—the one that was sent—merely expressed the hope that the request might seem reasonable to the Secretary, but omitted the specific request that the matter be referred to the Secretary.

Another sentence in the letter which was not sent reads as follows:

"Judge Westcott, formerly attorney general of New Jersey, and who doubtless is well and favorably known to Mr. Baker, is a consulting counsel in the case and adviser of Mr. Gibboney."

That sentence was changed to read as follows in the letter that was sent:

"His home counsel in Philadelphia is Mr. D. C. Gibboney, of unexcelled repute as a man and a lawyer. Of counsel also, in a consulting capacity, is Judge Westcott, of New Jersey, whom doubtless the Secretary well knows."

General Ansell is a man of extraordinary native ability, wonderfully improved by training and education. No man better knows the exact use of words and their effect than does he. The conclusion is irresistible that General Ansell was then using with emphasis the name of Judge Westcott to bring influence to bear upon the Secretary of War, should the communication ever reach him, and just as certainly to bring to bear additional influence with General Harris.

Also, in the letter first dictated, he said that Judge Westcott was "adviser of Mr. Gibboney." That expression or assertion is left out of the letter which was sent. Is it possible that General Ansell, even at that time, was giving more or less thought, with the view of later dividing responsibility, to the attitude of nonemployment which Judge Westcott assumed? Westcott admitted that he "advised" with Gibboney, but denied that he was employed by Bergdoll, and there is no contradictory proof.

In the letter which was not sent General Ansell used this language:

"Last Friday Mr. Gibboney, accompanied by Judge Westcott, came to my office and conferred with me about a situation concerning young Bergdoll's property, which was so strange that the truth of it, under normal circumstances, would hardly justify belief."

Upon consideration by General Ansell that language must have appeared too strong. No doubt he was apprehensive that that language might raise with General Harris a question as to the plausibility of the whole story. In that language General Ansell stated, in substance, that Gibboney and Westcott had conferred with him about a situation which "would hardly justify belief." So, if the story about which Ansell, Gibboney, and Westcott "conferred" would "hardly justify belief," it must be changed, if General Harris was expected to accept and act upon it. Then General Ansell's statement was changed into being such a plausible one that all of them—including Ansell—believed the story; and, in consequence, were "impelled" to make the request.

The changed or altered statement reads as follows:

"These gentlemen visited me last Friday and related to me a situation which we believe to be true and which impels us to submit this request."

When General Ansell dictated the statement that "would hardly justify belief," that statement being the result of a conference with Gibboney and Westcott, one must wonder whether or not those two gentlemen, or either of them, consented to the change from lack of belief to one so certain that they were "impelled" by it to ask for Bergdoll's release. It is a self-evident fact—the others not being in Washington—that Ansell made the change without consulting the others. He attributed to each of them a "belief" which, perhaps, neither entertained. In the first draft it is not stated that either believed the story, but in the second all are represented as believers in it.

It is interesting to note the reasons assigned by General Ansell for the burial of the gold. In the letter not sent he uses this language:

"This young man has unquestionably inherited a very considerable property from his father. He has not heretofore developed that sense of responsibility required for the care and proper use of a large sum of money. I understand that the control and influence of his mother have not tended to the development of an adequate sense of responsibility in such matter. I am advised also that there have been family difficulties which seem to have produced a desire in this young man to get a physical control over his property, ungoverned by the other members of the family."

In the letter actually sent to General Harris, General Ansell gave the following as an explanation of the unusual conduct of Grover Bergdoll:

"This young man was reared fatherless under family conditions which, even when partially revealed, throw considerable light upon conduct of his that, to say the least, is strange if not unintelligible. From his father he inherited wealth. Apprehending the family desire to control his share, he at times has openly submitted and at others has become secretive of his wealth. This latter perhaps is the most influential of the many complex motives for his action in the instance I now speak of."

In the letter not sent, General Ansell speaks of certain vague "family difficulties," which "seem" to have caused Bergdoll to desire a physical control of his property. These paragraphs clearly illustrate the difficulties, which even the astute mind of Ansell could not overcome, in giving adequate and sufficient explanation of the motives which prompted Bergdoll to bury the gold. Some excuse for this conduct had to be given, and the labored efforts of Ansell have only tended to make confusion worse confounded.

The letter which was not sent used the language: "There can be no danger of escape." That was changed in the letter which was sent to: "This prisoner has no desire to escape." That change makes the statement stronger to General Harris, and also lays the foundation for denial of personal responsibility in the future for counsel not attending the expedition.

It should be noted that General Ansell did not merely express the opinion that the "prisoner has no desire to escape." Instead he made the unqualified statement to that effect. How did he know the prisoner had no desire to escape? According to his own admissions he then had had no communication with the prisoner relative to the expedition for the buried gold, and consequently no direct information upon which to base that statement as fact. It may be that the other attorneys who consulted with General Ansell about the release to get the alleged buried gold agreed to the statement that "there can be no danger of escape"; but it is possible, at least, that they would not have approved the statement as fact that Bergdoll had "no desire to escape." The former statement, no doubt, was based on the then, but afterwards violated, arrangement that one of counsel was to accompany the expedition; that the prisoner was to be handcuffed; that a commissioned officer was to go along, and that the guard was to be both ample and properly instructed.

The first proposition accompanied by the foregoing considerations is quite different from the one that "the prisoner has no desire to escape," especially since each and every one of the conditions just related were to be utterly disregarded.

It is going a long way for one of the counsel to make such a wide departure from the original statement without having the approval of the counsel whose names were used in the communication conveying the changed representations.

In the letter which was sent there is something that does not appear in the one which was not sent. That language is this:

"He (Bergdoll) is now wrought with fear and anxiety lest he may not recover the money, and accordingly earnestly asked me (Ansell), other counsel joining him, to endeavor to arrange it that he (Bergdoll) may go, under guard and with his counsel, to recover the money and place it in safekeeping, all expenses to be borne by us."

When it is considered that General Ansell stated that he had no communication with Bergdoll after he saw him at Governors Island on April 17, when, according to General Ansell, no mention was made of the proposed search for the buried gold, was very remarkable, to say the least.

It will be noticed that General Ansell says in the above quotation that Bergdoll earnestly asks him to endeavor to arrange it so that he (Bergdoll) may go, under guard and with his counsel, to recover the alleged buried gold.

If at that time General Ansell had had "no communication" with Bergdoll relative to the matter, how is it possible that Bergdoll so "earnestly" made that request of him? General Ansell can not claim that that request was conveyed to him through either Gibboney or Westcott, for the reason that he himself says in the above-quoted paragraph that the request was made by Bergdoll, "other counsel joining him" in the request. Nothing of that sort was said in the letter which General Ansell dictated to his stenographer immediately after he left General Harris on May 11. That must have been an afterthought, originating in his own mind and not warranted by the statement of either Gibboney or Westcott.

In both letters—the one which was not sent and the one which was sent—General Ansell stated that he would be responsible for the return of the prisoner.

General Ansell in his testimony repeated several times the statement that General Harris "did not expect" him to accompany Bergdoll on the expedition, but that he did expect some one or more of counsel to accompany it. Both General Ansell and his partner, Mr. Bailey, testified that the agreed arrangement was that Mr. Bailey was, at least, to meet the expedition at Hagerstown, Md., and accompany it during the remaining 20 or 25 miles of the proposed journey to the spot where the gold was said to be buried. The law firm of Ansell & Bailey was employed by Bergdoll, but General Ansell did not pledge the firm to see to it that Bergdoll was returned. Instead, the pledge was General Ansell's personal one.

It has been admitted by General Ansell and by everybody else who testified upon that point that at least one of Bergdoll's attorneys was to accompany the expedition.

General Ansell himself did not state that he told General Harris that he himself would not accompany the expedition. He merely expressed the opinion that General Harris "did not expect" him to do so. If General Ansell himself was not to go, but counsel was to go, then the question arises: Whom did General Harris "expect" would go? Neither of General Ansell's letters—the one which was sent nor the one which was not sent—indicates that Westcott was to go. In the letter which was sent Westcott is referred to as an attorney "in a consulting capacity," while in the one which was not sent Westcott was referred to as an "advisor of Mr. Gibboney." In addition, Westcott is an old, palsied man, not physically equal to the trip outlined by General Ansell.

General Ansell himself did not in his testimony make even the slightest claim that Westcott was to go. Therefore, according to General Ansell, not attorney except Gibboney or Bailey could have been expected to go. General Ansell says he himself did not contemplate making the trip; and since he knew that Judge Westcott could not, if he would; and, further, since he knew two days and two nights before the expedition started that his partner, Mr. Bailey, was not going, he was bound to know that the only one of counsel who might possibly accompany the expedition from beginning to end was Mr. Gibboney.

General Ansell knew several days in advance that the expedition would start May 20; and he knew that Gibboney himself did not contemplate making more than a part, if any, of the journey. So there is no escape from the conclusion that General Ansell knew, at least two days and two nights before the journey started, that his pledge made to General Harris in this respect was to be violated.

When General Ansell was on the witness stand the question was put to him a number of times, and by different members of the committee, to indicate at least one specific act done by him looking toward the redemption of that pledge. To each and every one of those questions he was either nonresponsive or evasive. To some of them he replied, in substance, that he had sought to have Bergdoll recaptured after the escape had been accomplished. In other words, all that he specifically claimed to have done was to undertake to lock the stable door after the horse had gone. He plead, in extenuation, after Bergdoll had escaped, that he offered a reward for his recapture. If he had been recaptured and the reward had been claimed, no doubt every one of the many who furnished information here and there would have claimed all or part of the reward, and litigation over it would have been interminable, and the day of payment far in the future, if at all. Then, it is most probable, indeed, that an officer, and not a private citizen, would have made the arrest; and an officer can not maintain a cause of action to enforce the payment of a reward for making an arrest which he should have made regardless of the reward.

The two letters—the one which was sent and the one which was not sent—when taken in connection with all of the other happenings in the case, show that General Ansell was not only taking advantage of his long association in the Army with General Harris, but was actually misleading him into having Bergdoll released for the purpose of seeking the alleged hidden gold. It also is clear that he undertook to use Judge Westcott for the purpose of bringing to bear a political influence upon anybody in the then administration who might be needed to make sure of the gold-hunt release; which, at last, spelled Bergdoll's escape. Then, when Judge Westcott, in response to General Ansell's urging, had not seen the Secretary of War in person, Ansell, still using him, had him write a letter to the Secretary of War asking him to take Bergdoll's case under personal advisement.

It was known to General Ansell that Judge Westcott had put Woodrow Wilson in nomination for the Presidency of the United States, both at Baltimore and four years later at St. Louis, and that Westcott was a personal friend of both the President and the Secretary of War. Knowing that, he took particular pains to inject Westcott's name into the letter which he wrote General Harris; and then, in his presence, had Westcott write a letter to the Secretary of War in Bergdoll's behalf, based upon Westcott's alleged "enormous" interest in the case.

It was made clear that Westcott's services as active counsel in the case were sought by both Gibboney and the Bergdolls, and just as clear that Westcott declined to act in that capacity.

Since Gibboney, practicing only in the civil courts, and Ansell, practicing as an expert in military law, met, it matters little which found the other, or how, as both were on a hunt for the Bergdoll gold, and each got much of it.

After the employment of the firm of Ansell & Bailey, both Ansell and Bailey visited Governors Island and saw Bergdoll, their visits being made at different times. Mr. Bailey returned from Governors Island to Washington and reported to General Ansell at his residence on the night of the 17th of May, at which time it became understood and agreed between them that neither was to go upon any part of the expedition. The question naturally arises that if one or the other of them was to go—and Bailey admits that he had agreed to join the expedition at Hagerstown, Md.—why was there a change of mind just following Bailey's return from a visit to Bergdoll to the effect that neither was to go at all? And, further, why was not General Harris so advised? He was within a stone's throw of them during these two days and two nights. What happened between May 11 and May 17 that did away with the necessity of even Bailey's going? Was information received by either Ansell or Bailey at Governors Island, where Bergdoll was confined under Colonel Hunt, that the gold was not buried at Hagerstown, or that the expedition would not proceed beyond Philadelphia, where Mrs. Bergdoll says the gold was buried and at which point Bergdoll escaped?

The fact has been established by Treasury officials that Mrs. Bergdoll, during October and November, 1920, exchanged $105,000 in currency for that amount in gold; and it is conceded that she took that gold by automobile from Washington to Philadelphia.

About a month and a half after Mrs. Bergdoll got the $60,000 in gold, which was the last amount gotten, young Bergdoll was arrested in his mother's house in Philadelphia. Shortly after his arrest and his transfer to Governors Island he there commenced telling about having buried two different amounts of gold. His mother had gotten two different amounts of gold—$45,000 and $60,000—and she has testified that she made two different burials of these amounts. She further states that her son neither knew that she had gotten gold nor that she had buried any.

It is admitted by Mrs. Bergdoll that young Bergdoll had been at her house in Philadelphia quite a little between the time she got the gold and the time when he was arrested and taken away to Governors Island. It is strikingly strange that he should be telling his associates in prison and counsel that he had buried two sums of gold, amounting to more than $100,000, while, if we believe the mother, she had actually buried the two different sums, aggregating approximately the same amount of which Bergdoll himself was speaking.

The conclusion is not an unreasonable one that if Mrs. Bergdoll did bury the gold gotten from the Treasury, and did make two different burials of it, then young Bergdoll must have known of the whole transaction. Otherwise he only imagined or dreamed of a condition that exactly coincided with the undisclosed but actual doings of his mother.

On the 19th of April, 1920, General Ansell prepared a contract fixing the fee which the firm of Ansell & Bailey was to receive as attorneys for Bergdoll. That tentative contract was submitted by General Ansell to Mr. Gibboney for his approval; but Mr. Gibboney declined to approve it. Thereafter, on the 23d day of April, Mr. Gibboney himself, representing Bergdoll with carte blanche authority, submitted a counter tentative contract to General Ansell.

Under the terms of the first tentative contract, Ansell & Bailey, according to the construction put upon it by Mr. Bailey, could have received $60,000. Still, according to Mr. Bailey, under the tentative counter contract submitted by Mr. Gibboney, Ansell & Bailey could have received $55,000.

General Ansell stated in his testimony that the tentative contract submitted by Gibboney to him was never executed, notwithstanding the fact that he also stated that the terms of that tentative counter contract were agreeable to him. Now, the question arises: If Gibboney prepared and submitted a paper whereby $55,000 was to be paid, and that paper was fully acceptable to Ansell, why was it not executed? Gibboney, when submitting the counter contract, was personally present with Ansell. All that was necessary was for both of them to sign it. Something, we know not what, only by surmise, must have become understood between those two men upon that occasion that caused them to abandon the execution of a contract agreeable to them both. But it is certain that after that date, from all the committee has been able to gather, neither the execution of that contract nor any other was ever mentioned or pressed by either of the proposed parties to it. General Ansell had gone to the trouble to prepare a contract for employment, and Gibboney had done the same about a counter one; yet, when their minds met in full agreement, all attempts to conclude the contract were abandoned by both.

For all that the committee really knows, General Ansell was employed by Gibboney to represent Bergdoll only in the then pending litigation between the United States and Bergdoll. General Ansell refused to even look at the first papers until he had been paid $100, and he refused to have anything to do with the case until he had been paid $5,000 more. Yet we find him departing from that employment and taking up another important piece of work, that of securing the expedition, without disclosed fee or contract for fee, when the actual work to be done by himself and partner, including the visit to Governors Island and the agreement to accompany the expedition for many miles in a mountainous region, to say nothing of the obligation for the prisoner's return, was bigger and more onerous—besides being fraught with the danger of questionable ethics—than was the original proposition, for which he proposed to charge $60,000.

The absence of a fee or a contract for one must be significant when taken in connection with one whose ever-first thought seems to have been given to the payment or securing of a large fee.

The suggestion that Bergdoll's escape defeated the collection of the Ansell fee is fallacious. Bergdoll had nearly a million dollars' worth of property within reach with which to pay fees at any time, either for the preparation of the brief in the military case or for procuring the gold-hunting expedition. Consequently it was not necessary to find the gold in order to get the fee.

Already it has been shown that neither Ansell nor Bailey contemplated going with the expedition after Bailey's return from Governors Island, where he saw Bergdoll two days before the expedition started. The only remaining attorney who might be expected by anybody, even by General Ansell himself, to go upon the expedition was Gibboney, and he even failed to accompany the expedition from New York to Philadelphia.

When Bergdoll arrived at the railroad station in North Philadelphia from Governors Island, Gibboney was there to meet him with a letter of identification from Colonel Hunt. However, Gibboney rode only a few blocks in the automobile with Bergdoll and his guards, when he abandoned the party never to join it again.

Mrs. Bergdoll testified that on the next morning after she received each of the sums of gold she had her chauffeur to drive her away from her residence to a point where she said she buried it. The Bergdolls owned a farm about 11 miles out of Philadelphia. Mrs. Bergdoll stated that she took the gold in her automobile and took along a shovel with which to bury it. She stated that when she had reached the spot of burial she sent her chauffeur away from the automobile to gather apples, and that while he was gathering apples she buried the gold. If that be true, the gold was buried on the Bergdoll farm, and it was not contemplated that the expedition procured by General Ansell was to go beyond Philadelphia. Can it be possible that an ascertainment of the fact that the gold which Mrs. Bergdoll had gotten from the Treasury had been buried on the Bergdoll farm, not far from Philadelphia, caused all of counsel to repudiate the pledge that counsel was to accompany the expedition?

The fact has been established that when Bergdoll and his guard arrived at North Philadelphia, under directions of Mr. Gibboney, who held Colonel Hunt's letter of identification, they went to the Bergdoll residence accompanied by "Judge" Romig and Ike Stecher. Stecher is the man who fled with Bergdoll, and who now is in Germany with him. The further fact has been just as well established that on that very afternoon these same parties drove out to the Bergdoll farm and roamed about over it, instead of going on to Hagerstown, Md., as represented to General Harris by General Ansell would be done.

In view of the foregoing, how is it possible to hold General Ansell blameless? Being 46 years of age, he is just in the prime of all of his abundant faculties. He is both able and alert. Intellectually he is wonderfully endowed; and having spent 25 years in the Army, where he had every phase of humankind to deal with, we must believe that he was fully equipped to counter any attempt at deception upon the part of Bergdoll, Gibboney, or the guards. He was far from being such a novice in the affairs of the world that Gibboney, Bergdoll, Romig, or the guards could have pulled the wool over his eyes and blinded him as to the inevitable result of the expedition which he alone had procured. Anybody who has seen and heard all of those associated, either directly or indirectly, with the plan or manner of Bergdoll's escape, not only must recognize General Ansell as the master mind of them all, but also as their dominating and controlling spirit. He is not the kind of man that will merely follow. Upon the other hand, his is the character of one who must lead. His ability, his experience, have equipped him to lead even the most intelligent of associates.

Bergdoll's escape was the direct result of the proposition submitted by General Ansell to General Harris. Even if General Ansell did not conceive the plan, he presented it and pursued it to its accomplishment. The others had exhausted all remedies known to them as attorneys practicing in the civil courts. It was General Ansell, resourceful and conversant with military possibilities, who must have conceived it.

In fact, Gibboney, Romig, and the Bergdoll family conspiring among themselves were unable to bring about the order for Bergdoll's release. Such, of course, was the object of the conspiracy, but in order to successfully accomplish it it was absolutely necessary to have the active assistance and cooperation of Ansell and Bailey and Colonel Hunt. Without the aid of these latter Bergdoll could not have left Governors Island.

When Bergdoll was arrested on January 7, 1920, as already said, he was taken, in handcuffs, directly to Governors Island, N. Y., and put in charge of Colonel Hunt, commandant of the military disciplinary barracks at that place.

While Bergdoll was confined there, Colonel Hunt was several times apprised of the dangerous character of Bergdoll and of the probability of his attempting to escape. The police authorities at Philadelphia well knew Bergdoll's character as a dangerous, reckless fellow. Notwithstanding that advice, Colonel Hunt, according to his own testimony, preferred to rely upon a board of p-s-y-c-h-i-a-t-r-i-s-t-s as to Bergdoll's character.

When Bergdoll was arrested on January 7, 1920, after he had been a fugitive for more than a year and a half, approximately 30 guns and pistols were found in the house in which he was arrested. One of those guns was a rifle equipped with a Maxim silencer. All these weapons were removed from the house by Government authorities. However, immediately after his final escape from the same house on May 21, 1920, it was discovered that the supply had been replenished, as seven shotguns in the meanwhile had been brought in. In addition, there was a pistol or two and a blackjack in the house. After his escape to the Canadian line had been accomplished, and he had abandoned his automobile there, a large revolver and a Lueger repeating pistol were found in his automobile. These facts bear out the Philadelphia police in their opinion that Bergdoll was a dangerous man and would do violence if the occasion for doing so presented itself, the opinion of Colonel Hunt's board of p-s-y-c-h-i-a-t-r-i-s-t-s to the contrary notwithstanding.

Colonel Hunt admitted that he disregarded the admonitions and warnings as to Bergdoll's character and his possible escape; and, instead, relied upon the diagnosis made by his board of p-s-y-c-h-i-a-t-r-i-s-t-s. When testifying in his own behalf during his court-martial trial, and while referring to the warnings about Bergdoll, Colonel Hunt said:

* * * "The weight of those two warnings—the legal obligation contained in them—was just about the legal obligations of a communication from the mayor of Timbuctoo." (P. 260, court-martial trial of Colonel Hunt.)

One of the warnings given to Colonel Hunt was dated March 8, 1920, and was signed by William Weigel, colonel, General Staff. The communication reads as follows:

"1. Attention is directed to letter from the department adjutant dated January 20, 1920, addressed to you and relating to Grover C. Bergdoll.

"2. In addition to the precautions directed in the letter referred to above, the department commander directs that at all times when Bergdoll leaves the walls of Castle William, he be guarded by two armed sentinels. Whenever Bergdoll in his present status leaves the island, the commanding general directs that he be handcuffed to one sentinel and guarded by another sentinel. The dangerous character of this prisoner has been reported by the police authorities of Philadelphia, who are in a position to know the amount of force which is probably necessary for his restraint, and this direction is made because of the information gained from these experienced police officials."

Relative to those warnings Colonel Hunt, in his court-martial trial, testified as follows:

"Q. I asked you if you considered him a dangerous prisoner?—A. During the time of his trial I had more accurate information and was in better position to judge, in my opinion, of the dangerous character of Bergdoll, of his criminal mind, than the judge advocate, than the judge advocate's office, or the judge advocate of the department, or anybody else; I had received full information from a careful and scientific investigation, conducted by a board of officers, who inquired into his sanity. I received information from Major Baker, who was my p-s-y-c-h-i-a-t-r-i-s-t, and I regarded it as absolutely dependable. At the time I received these two communications I knew all about Bergdoll. I had received the official and scientific opinion of an authority in regard to Bergdoll. Those letters were worth to me just as much as they were based on facts, and they were not based on any facts at all. So far as this information was concerned there wasn't anything in that."

That was one of the several instances of his defiance of superior authority in Bergdoll's favor.

In addition to the court-martial trial with which we are now dealing Colonel Hunt was court-martialed three times on the charge of drunkenness. In one of these court-martial proceedings he was sentenced to be dismissed from the service. Appeal was made to President Taft, who, in his usual good nature, commuted his punishment to that of a reduction of 50 files. Upon one of these three occasions he undertook to anticipate and prevent conviction by making a solemn pledge that he would not indulge in any intoxicating liquors for a period of 10 years. That promise he failed to keep.

There can be no better nor more convincing proof of Colonel Hunt's defiance of authority and ignoring of instructions than is found in his own testimony before his court-martial trial on account of the Bergdoll escape.

Throughout that whole court-martial trial he contended that Bergdoll should have been treated like the least offending prisoner, notwithstanding the information which had been conveyed to him relative to Bergdoll's dangerous character, and his probable attempts at escape. His contention to that effect was based entirely upon the report of the p-s-y-c-h-i-a-t-r-i-s-t-s, the actual and patent facts to the contrary notwithstanding. Besides Colonel Hunt was conducting the prison on an "uplift" policy. He introduced witnesses to prove in effect that it was better to trust Bergdoll to the extent that he did well-known harmless prisoners than to keep him confined or under close surveillance, as he had been instructed to do.

He resented every suggestion made to him relative to keeping a close watch over Bergdoll. His determination to pursue his own narrow way about things; his ignoring directions and defying instructions from the higher authorities at Washington are not short of being criminal; and Bergdoll's escape is traceable directly to that criminality as one of the several important happenings contributing to that deplorable end.

Colonel Hunt first endeavored to excuse what, justly, may be termed the insufficient guard by claiming that he alone had the right to determine how much of a guard should accompany the prisoner, and that nobody else had any right even to make suggestions as to the sufficiency of the guard. Throughout his testimony in the court-martial trial he constantly exhibited that resentment and defiance.

When that attitude had aroused criticism, he sought shelter under the assertion that he did not have a commissioned officer who could be spared when the expedition started.

He said that one commissioned officer was absent on leave and that another had just returned from taking some prisoners out to Leavenworth and was too fatigued to then go upon this expedition, and that in consequence he sent the prisoner out accompanied by only two sergeants.

When he made that statement he must have thought that other people would overlook the fact that he himself could select the day and the hour when the expedition should start. Therefore he, after a conference with Bergdoll's counsel and some of the convicted conspirators, chose a day when, according to his own statements, he knew he could not comply with the instructions of his superior officers by sending a commissioned officer along. Except that he was acting in defiance of instructions and in collusion with the prisoner, his friends, and his attorneys, he would have selected a day for the expedition when all instructions could have been complied with, including the sending of a commissioned officer.

Bergdoll received surprisingly considerate treatment from Colonel Hunt. A man named Speicher slept in the same cell with Bergdoll. Speicher made many trips to New York during that time. There is no doubt that Bergdoll kept in close touch with the outside world through Speicher as well as through others.

Harry Weinberger, the New York lawyer, testified that Speicher upon one occasion came to his office and brought a note from Bergdoll. About that time Speicher got into some trouble and $200 was necessary to get him out of it. That amount was paid by Bergdoll through his mother. If Speicher was receiving that gift and probably others from Bergdoll, and delivering communications to Weinberger, it is reasonably certain that he was delivering communications from Bergdoll to outsiders and from outsiders to Bergdoll.

Mrs. Bergdoll testified that she was permitted to place $700 in the prison at the disposal of her son in order that he might purchase knickknacks for his fellow prisoners.

When O'Hare, one of the sergeants who was to accompany Bergdoll upon the expedition, was about to start thereon, he asked Colonel Hunt for handcuffs, but they were refused.

While in prison Bergdoll and the other prisoners were clothed in prison garb, easily distinguishable, and upon the clothing of each was a prison number. Colonel Hunt sent other prisoners than Bergdoll to Philadelphia, and he sent them in the prison garb, bearing their prison numbers. But when he came to send Bergdoll on his buried-gold mission he had the prison garb removed, and clad him in the uniform of an honorable soldier, except there was no cord around the hatband. It is quite easily seen that if Bergdoll had escaped in his prison garb, bearing a prison number, many persons would have been willing to halt him and bring him to account; but, the fact that he was clad in the uniform of a soldier of our country threw off suspicion; and, instead of blocking his escape, made it easier, as all respected the uniform of the country. Every direction which looked toward Bergdoll's safe-keeping was rejected by Hunt, and everything that might facilitate his escape was done without question or quibble.

There is some conflict between the testimony of Colonel Hunt and that of Sergeant O'Hare relative to the instructions given by Colonel Hunt to O'Hare when he was told that he was to go on the expedition as one of the two guards. Notwithstanding this conflict it is quite certain that the main instructions given to O'Hare by Colonel Hunt were given merely by submitting to him, and having him read, the official letters from Washington.

It appears that Colonel Hunt called Sergeant O'Hare into his office and told him that the expedition would start on the morning of the 20th, and that he and another sergeant were to constitute the guard; but that as between himself and the other sergeant, he, O'Hare, was to be the principal officer.

Then Colonel Hunt gave the official letters to Sergeant O'Hare and told him to read them. While O'Hare was reading the letters Hunt turned to his desk and wrote with pen and ink.

When O'Hare had finished reading the letters Hunt turned to him and asked him if he understood them. O'Hare answered affirmatively.

Colonel Hunt never asked O'Hare a single question for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not he correctly understood them. He made no effort whatever to learn whether O'Hare understood them just as he, himself, did. As a matter of fact, O'Hare left Colonel Hunt and went upon the expedition as the principal guard, with only his own construction of the letters, without having them explained by Colonel Hunt, and without ascertaining whether the two of them understood the letters alike.

O'Hare testified that when he asked Colonel Hunt to give him handcuffs so that Bergdoll might be handcuffed, Hunt replied that handcuffs would make Bergdoll "too conspicious."

To test O'Hare's capacity to correctly understand the letters which Colonel Hunt, without explanation, had shown him, he was asked to spell the word "conspicuous," a word used by Hunt in talking to O'Hare. He spelled it "c-o-n-p-i-c-i-o-u-s."

The following colloquy during the hearings will clearly show O'Hare's lack of education and his consequent lack of ability to properly interpret the letters:

"Mr. JOHNSON. What did you say that Colonel Hunt said about the handcuffs?

"Sergeant O'HARE. He said they would be too 'conspicuous.'

"Mr. JOHNSON. Too 'conspicuous'?

"Sergeant O'HARE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Spell that word, please.

"Sergeant O'HARE. C-o-n-p-i-c-o-u-s.

"Mr. JOHNSON. The first line of the letter which General Ansell wrote to General Harris, and which letter was submitted to you by Colonel Hunt on that occasion for you to read, starts out this way: 'Please permit me, in compliance with your helpful suggestion.' What does the word 'compliance' there mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. To request him to do something.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Tell the committee what you think the word 'compliance' means.

"Sergeant O'HARE. To do something.

"Mr. JOHNSON. The second paragraph in the same letter starts out this way: 'This man, by virtue of his conviction and sentence as a so-called draft deserter, is now imprisoned at Fort Jay, pending the review of his trial by the War Department.'

"What does the 'virtue' in that sentence mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. I couldn't say.

"Mr. JOHNSON. What does the word 'pending' in that sentence mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. Pending the opening up of the case, waiting for a new trial.

"Mr. JOHNSON. The next sentence in the letter reads: 'I am his attorney. His home counsel in Philadelphia is Mr. D. C. Gibboney, of unexcelled repute as a man and lawyer.' What does 'repute' mean in that sentence?

"Sergeant O'HARE. A man who is honest and a good reputation.

"Mr. JOHNSON. What does 'unexcelled' mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. Unexcelled? Can't be beat.

"Mr. PETERS. That is right.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Spell 'unexcelled.'

"Sergeant O'HARE. U-n-e-x-c-e-l-l-e-d.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Another sentence in this letter reads: 'Of counsel also in consulting capacity is Judge Westcott, of New Jersey, whom doubtless the Secretary of State well knows.' What does the word 'consulting' there mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. To assist.

"Mr. JOHNSON. 'Whom doubtless the Secretary well knows.' What does the word 'doubtless' mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. Well known.

"Mr. JOHNSON. In the next sentence I find the word 'impels.' What does that mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. Impel is to assist.

"Mr. JOHNSON. In the next paragraph I find the word 'partially.' What does that mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. A kind of helping hand.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Spell it.

"Sergeant O'HARE. Partially?

"Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

"Sergeant O'HARE. I can't do it.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Make an effort at spelling it.

"Sergeant O'HARE. I can't do it. I can't spell it.

"Mr. JOHNSON. In the next line I find the word 'unintelligible.' What does that mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. Don't know anything; don't know much.

"Mr. JOHNSON. In the next line I find the word 'complex.' What does that mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. Complex?

"Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

"Sergeant O'HARE. A peculiar case.

"Mr. JOHNSON. In the concluding sentence of General Ansell's letter to General Harris I find the word 'obvious.' What does that mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. I don't know, sir.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Can you spell it?

"Sergeant O'HARE. O-b-i-o-u-s.

"Mr. JOHNSON. In the same sentence I find the word 'practicable.' What does that mean?

"Sergeant O'HARE. Reliable.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Colonel Hunt, as I just said, has testified that he turned these letters over to you that you might read them for the purpose of being instructed as to what you were to do and where you were to go upon that journey. You now state, do you not, that you do not know the meaning of some of the words in those letters?

"Sergeant O'HARE. Yes, sir. When I read a sentence I can almost make out what it is, or read a paragraph."

It will be noticed by the last question and answer that O'Hare admitted that he did not know the meaning of many of the words in the letters. According to his own statements, the best he can do is "almost" make out what it means.

York, the sergeant who, with O'Hare, constituted the guard, admittedly was given no instructions whatever. If anything had happened to O'Hare York would have been absolutely without any sort of instruction.

As said, while O'Hare was reading the two letters, Hunt was writing a letter in longhand to Gibboney. That letter was shown by Hunt to O'Hare, that O'Hare might be able upon reaching North Philadelphia to identify Gibboney, by whom the letter was to be shown to O'Hare when he reached Philadelphia to report to Gibboney. That letter reads as follows:

GOVERNORS ISLAND, N. Y., May 17, 1920.

MR. D. CLARENCE GIBBONEY.

SIR: This letter is to serve the purpose of your identification in the matter which was arranged in my quarters on Governors Island.

Very respectfully,

JOHN E. HUNT, Major, Infantry.

When O'Hare, with his prisoner, arrived at the North Philadelphia station, Gibboney went to O'Hare and presented the letter which had been written by Hunt, and which O'Hare had seen before it was mailed to Gibboney. O'Hare states positively, and the above letter and every other circumstance bears him out, that when the expedition reached North Philadelphia, Gibboney, as Bergdoll's attorney, was to have control as to where the party should go. O'Hare, following his construction of the letters, including the one of identification written by Hunt, clearly showed that Hunt intended that O'Hare should report to Gibboney at Philadelphia, and there receive instructions from him as to the rest of the journey, since it is admitted by all that O'Hare knew neither the road nor the destination.

Believing, and correctly so, that from that moment Gibboney was to control their movements, O'Hare followed Gibboney's instructions and took Bergdoll to his own residence.

It seems clear that it never was intended that the expedition should proceed beyond Philadelphia; and it is no difficult matter to determine who knew in advance that it was not to proceed further.

Two days and two nights before the expedition started both Ansell and Bailey abandoned any intention to go that either may have had, as well as any understanding with anyone in authority that either of them was to meet the party at Hagerstown or anywhere else. Hunt did not direct O'Hare and York, the two guards, to compel Bergdoll to go farther than Philadelphia. Instead, he wrote the letter above referred to; showed it to O'Hare; then mailed it to Gibboney, and had Gibboney present it at Philadelphia to O'Hare in order, as Colonel Hunt says, that O'Hare might be able to identify Gibboney.

The question arises: For what purpose was Gibboney to be identified by O'Hare? Was it that he might merely make the acquaintance of Gibboney; or was it that Gibboney, just as O'Hare says, was to tell O'Hare where the party should go? That letter was not written as an introduction of Gibboney or for any other unimportant matter. It was written with the serious and important intent of having O'Hare report to Gibboney for instructions not given by him by Hunt himself. There can be no doubt about that.

Following Gibboney's directions, the party entered an automobile. Scarcely were they seated in the automobile until Gibboney gave directions to proceed to the Bergdoll residence, he himself leaving the automobile at a convenient place to go to the court room, where Mrs. Bergdoll was then being tried.

Neither Gibboney, Romig, nor Ike Stecker, all of whom said they were going on the journey to Hagerstown, Md., on a mission which required them to be out several days, had any baggage whatever when they met Bergdoll and the guard at North Philadelphia.

Mrs. Bergdoll, although a millionaire, usually does all of her own work, cooking, washing and ironing, and other household duties. Notwithstanding this fact, on the day before Bergdoll arrived at her residence in Philadelphia she arranged for Mrs. Stecker to come to her house on the following day to cook dinner. The next day—the day when Bergdoll and the party actually arrived at the residence—Mrs. Bergdoll had put part of the dinner on the stove to be cooked. Other provisions for the dinner were already in the kitchen. Mrs. Bergdoll purchases her meager supply of groceries from day to day, if not from meal to meal.

On this day there would have been nobody at the house for dinner if Bergdoll, O'Hare, and the others were not to be there, except Mrs. Bergdoll, her mother, and the gardener. But, in addition to those three, there were present for dinner Mrs. Stecker, Grover Bergdoll, "Judge" Romig, Ike Stecker, Sergeant O'Hare, and Sergeant York. Yet there was ample dinner for all nine. Still all those who were helping young Bergdoll, including Ansell and Hunt, disclaim that there was to be a stop at Philadelphia.

It was testified that Gibboney stated that the journey was not to be pursued farther than Philadelphia that day because the automobile which the party was to use was "knocking." No immediate steps, if any at all, were taken to repair the car.

When O'Hare, with his prisoner and the others, arrived at the Bergdoll residence nobody was there except Mrs. Bergdoll's mother, who was more than 80 years of age.

Bergdoll proposed that they take a ride through the city until dinner time, they having reached the Bergdoll house about 10 o'clock. This they did, returning to the Bergdoll residence about 12 o'clock. In the meantime Mrs. Stecker had arrived and was preparing dinner—not for three persons, but for nine.

After dinner was over it was proposed not to have the automobile repaired, but to take another ride. This also they did; and during that ride they visited the Bergdoll farm, 11 miles out in the country. What happened there can be only surmised; but it should be remembered that if Mrs. Bergdoll, or Bergdoll himself, ever buried any gold, it must have been on the Bergdoll farm.

After the visit to the Bergdoll farm the party returned to the Bergdoll residence in Philadelphia. After supper was over there was nothing done by Ike Stecker, the chauffeur, looking toward the repair of the car, but, instead, the party took another ride in the alleged disabled car, during which time they went to a show and to a saloon.

A bottle or bottles of gin were placed in different parts of the Bergdoll home, where any of the party could partake of it at will. It is conceded that all except O'Hare drank some of it. This will be mentioned again further along.

It must be noticed that Gibboney, one of the Bergdoll attorneys, and who had long been a friend and attorney for the Bergdoll family, was out in town and not at the Bergdoll residence. It must also be noted that "Judge" Romig, an intimate friend and confidential adviser of the family, was within the residence with O'Hare, York, and the prisoner.

It is interesting to see who Gibboney and Romig are. Gibboney was an attorney at law, with but little knowledge of the law. His principal profession or occupation was that of a self-styled "uplifter" or reformer. In the latter capacity he pretended to be stamping out the liquor traffic and other evils. The Bergdolls owned a brewery, and some 1,200 or 1,400 saloons dispensed their beer. By and by Gibboney, as uplifter and reformer, came to be recognized by the authorities as one who, for the sake of peace, should be consulted about the issuing of licenses for these and other saloons. His opinions relative to issuing licenses to the Bergdoll saloons not only did not cause a rupture between himself and the Bergdolls but it brought him and them closer together. He was the man to whom Colonel Hunt delivered Bergdoll and the two sergeants, York and O'Hare. In addition, Gibboney was the man who was on the outside of the Bergdoll residence to observe, while "Judge" Romig was within to report, which he did by telephone.

Who is "Judge" Romig? He was never a licensed attorney. He acquired the title of "judge" because he was a justice of the peace, before whom offenders in the Bergdoll saloons were tried for minor offenses. His conduct as justice of the peace so greatly endeared him to the senior Bergdoll that he, when upon his deathbed, asked "Judge" Romig to look after Grover when he was gone. From that day until this "Judge" Romig has been a constant visitor at the Bergdoll residence and their confidential adviser. It was he who accompanied Mrs. Bergdoll and drove her automobile from Philadelphia to Washington upon the two occasions when Mrs. Bergdoll got $105,000 in gold from the Federal Treasury.

Up to this point it is seen that General Ansell procured the release of Bergdoll from Colonel Hunt, and Colonel Hunt placed Bergdoll in the hands of Sergeants O'Hare and York; and they, by Hunt's orders, delivered him to Gibboney, and Gibboney turned him over to Romig, the foster father, who accompanied him to the Bergdoll residence, from which he escaped. All that was not accident; it was design.

General Ansell in his letter to General Harris extolled the virtues of Gibboney. Yet when he came to testify he disclosed that his information as to Gibboney was acquired after the escape and not before. So his statements were made as facts when he lacked the necessary information upon which to base an opinion as to Gibboney's real character. If General Ansell had said as much to General Harris about Gibboney as he virtually admitted to the committee, no doubt General Harris would have refused under those circumstances what he granted under the other unqualified representations.

Almost immediately after the receipt of the letter sent by General Ansell to General Harris on May 11, Hunt, at Governors Island, was advised over the telephone by Colonel Penn that Bergdoll was to be released. On Sunday, May 16, "Judge" Romig went over to Governors Island. He saw Bergdoll upon that occasion. As to whom else he saw and what was said the committee is not advised. However, "Judge" Romig testified that upon that occasion Bergdoll spoke to him of the contemplated expedition to recover the buried gold. According to "Judge" Romig's own testimony he all but flew up into the air as soon as Bergdoll mentioned "gold" to him, and he reprimanded Bergdoll for having even mentioned "gold." "Judge" Romig had accompanied Mrs. Bergdoll from Philadelphia to Washington in her automobile upon the two occasions when she got in the aggregate $105,000 in gold. He helped her to carry it from the Treasury Building at Washington into the automobile, and in Philadelphia he helped her to carry it from the automobile into the Bergdoll residence. But for some unaccountable reason he said he would not permit young Bergdoll, while at Governors Island, to even mention "gold." By reference to Romig's testimony it will be seen that when asked if he believed the story of buried gold he stated that he believed the gold to be where he had last seen it; that is, in the Bergdoll house. It must be concluded that Romig then knew that Bergdoll's release and the expedition were not a hunt for gold, but intended for Bergdoll's escape, and he commenced in time to disclaim participation.

In the natural sequence of things the conduct of O'Hare should next be considered; but as the conduct and trial of Colonel Hunt are in such close intimacy with Col. C. C. Cresson, the judge advocate who prosecuted—or, rather, who was selected or detailed to prosecute Colonel Hunt—it is deemed best that his acts and omissions should be considered at this point in the report.

As ugly as are many phases of this whole matter, none is more defenseless than the conduct of Colonel Cresson in his pretended prosecution of Colonel Hunt.

To turn those loose who turned Bergdoll loose but adds insult to injury, and Colonel Cresson was the principal one of the instruments through which this latter offense was perpetrated.

The charges upon which Colonel Hunt was tried, as set out in the specifications, were:

"He suffered and permitted the * * * said general prisoner, Bergdoll, to leave said barracks on the date aforesaid not properly and suitably guarded and not accompanied by at least one of said counsel, in view of said information and warning, in that he did send said Bergdoll from said barracks in the custody of two noncommissioned officers, namely, Sergts. John O'Hare and Calvin York, Ninth Disciplinary Company, United States Army, whom he had detailed as guard over said prisoner for and during the journey contemplated by the instructions of The Adjutant General aforesaid, and then and there failed to instruct said guards, or either of them, to handcuff said prisoner or to direct that the said guard be provided with handcuffs for that purpose in case of need therefor, and failed and neglected to give said guards, or either of them, sufficient and adequate instructions as to their journey, the care and safeguarding of said prisoner, and their course of conduct in charge of said prisoner, and otherwise failed properly to instruct said guard, and also, in view of said information and warning as to said character of said prisoner as aforesaid, failed to send a commissioned officer with said guard as suggested in the instructions of The Adjutant General as aforesaid; by reason of all of which said carelessness, negligence, failure, and neglect of duty in the premises on the part of the said Lieut. Col. (then major, Infantry) John F. Hunt, United States Army, retired, and commandant as aforesaid, and as a result thereof said general prisoner Bergdoll did escape from the custody of said guard at Philadelphia, Pa., on or about the 21st day of May, 1920."

Concretely put, Hunt was charged:

1st. With not having the prisoner and the guard accompanied by at least one of the counsel.

2d. That he failed to instruct the guard to handcuff Bergdoll, or direct that the guard be provided with handcuffs in case of need thereof.

3d. That he failed and neglected to give the guard sufficient and adequate instructions as to their journey and safeguarding of the prisoner.

4th. That he failed to send a commissioned officer with the guard, as directed in the instructions of The Adjutant General.

5th. That he failed to send Bergdoll out with a suitable guard.

Colonel Hunt plead "not guilty" to each of those five charges; but when testifying in the court-martial trial, and also before this committee, he admitted that he did send the prisoner out without any of the counsel accompanying the expedition from New York to Philadelphia, and the expedition did not proceed beyond Philadelphia. The prisoner and the guard were actually unattended by any of the counsel during any part of the journey, except for the few city blocks while Gibboney was in the automobile with them, which was just before he turned the party over to either Romig or to Bergdoll himself.

As to the second charge, Colonel Hunt admitted he did not instruct the guard either to handcuff the prisoner or to take handcuffs along. On the contrary, he forbade both.

As to the third charge, which relates to instructions, it is not claimed by Colonel Hunt that he gave any instructions whatever to York, who was one of the two sergeants in whose charge the prisoner was placed. The only other guard was Sergeant O'Hare. The lack of instructions to him already has been commented upon. However, Colonel Hunt claims that he gave O'Hare verbal instructions in addition to having him read the letters already referred to. Everything that was said and done by either of them, and by all others who were connected with the unfortunate affair, goes to corroborate O'Hare and to discredit Colonel Hunt in this respect.

As to the fourth charge, Colonel Hunt admits that he did not send the commissioned officer, as he was told to do by the higher military authorities at Washington.

The fifth charge is that Colonel Hunt did not send a "suitable" guard.

O'Hare testified that he is 5 feet 5½ inches tall and that he weighs 130 pounds. Unquestionably he would have been an uneven match in a grapple with Bergdoll, who was a physical giant in comparison. It may be argued that O'Hare had a pistol; but what could he have done with a pistol if Bergdoll had seized him for the purpose of taking it away from him?

It has been clearly demonstrated that he did not have sufficient education to certainly understand the written instructions. One look at him discloses that he is a man far below the average in intelligence.

That he, without sanction or approval, permitted Bergdoll to be driven to the Bergdoll farm; that he accompanied Bergdoll to a show at night; and then, late at night, permitted Sergeant York to go into a saloon, is conclusive proof that he was not a "suitable" guard. That he permitted Bergdoll to get out of his sight while in the Bergdoll residence is but a finishing incident to establish his total inefficiency.

Sergeant York was the other of the two guards. As said, it is admitted by Colonel Hunt himself that he gave no instructions to him. Receiving no instructions whatever from Colonel Hunt, the charge must be true, as stated in the specifications, that he was not properly instructed. Colonel Hunt was not only delinquent in not instructing York but he was such in selecting him. He made a great boast that in O'Hare he knew he had a sober man. He lays no claim to knowing anything of the habits of York. As just stated, on the night of the first day that the party reached Philadelphia, York went into a saloon in the presence of O'Hare, who was York's immediate superior. Next, we find that in the Bergdoll residence a bottle of gin just "happened" to be wherever York went about the house; and it is not denied that both he and the prisoner drank freely of it.

The charge in the fifth specification, the one with which we are now dealing, relates to the "suitableness" of the guard. The question well may be asked, "Who, when made acquainted with the facts, will be willing to answer that the guard was 'suitable' for any purpose except for the easy escape of the prisoner?"

As to the five charges made in the specifications against Colonel Hunt, notwithstanding the fact that he plead "not guilty" to each of them, he specifically admitted three of them in his testimony, and the other two were established. Notwithstanding his admission of his guilt as to the first specification, the court acquitted him.

Another count in the specifications was that Colonel Hunt failed to provide the guard with handcuffs. To that charge he also plead "not guilty"; yet upon the witness stand he admitted the truth of the charge. In the face of that admission the court acquitted him.

To the third count Colonel Hunt again plead "not guilty"; but in his testimony he admitted that he did not send a commissioned officer. Still, as to that count the court again held him not guilty.

The other two counts in the specifications related to insufficient instructions to the guard and to the suitableness of the guard. Those two were established by the proof, but not by Hunt's admissions.

So all five counts were proven, three of them by Hunt's admissions, and yet the court found him "not guilty" on each and every one of them.

There can be no question that Sergeant O'Hare was imposed upon by Colonel Hunt. However, there can be no excuse made for the opportunity of escape which O'Hare gave Bergdoll. O'Hare was guilty of unpardonable negligence during the night spent in the Bergdoll residence in that he permitted Sergeant York to go upstairs and sleep with a bottle of gin, while he remained downstairs and slept in the same room (in another bed) with Bergdoll. Unless Bergdoll had had a safer and just as certain plan of escape, he either would have taken O'Hare's pistol from him while O'Hare was asleep, or he would have covered him with one of his seven shotguns, compelled him to hold up his hands and remain silent, and then go away in the automobile, possibly taking O'Hare with him and throwing him out in the road at such point as might best suit his purposes.

There can be no defense whatever made for Sergeant York. On their arrival at Philadelphia he got out of the automobile and went into a saloon. During that night and the next day at the Bergdoll residence on several occasions he drank gin, not only by himself but with the prisoner. He, too, is just as blamable as is O'Hare for letting Bergdoll get out of sight. He even did not sleep in the same room with the prisoner. Besides, when the telephone bells were ringing—no doubt as a signal to Bergdoll that everything was ready—York says he went to another floor of the house to get a drink of water, when there was water on the floor which he was leaving.

Lieut. Col. C. C. Cresson, as said, was the judge advocate detailed to prosecute Colonel Hunt in the court-martial trial.

Even before any testimony was introduced, Colonel Cresson made the following statement to the court:

"The Government disclaims, and personally and on behalf of the prosecution, any idea of there being anything crooked or any collusion on the part of Colonel Hunt in this matter, or that any money was used, the only charge in the matter being simply neglect of duty and failure to take due precautions in the matter." (P. 7, Hunt's court-martial trial record.)

By that declaration Colonel Cresson gave notice that he would not, if he could, prove that he did not furnish a sufficient guard if he was bribed not to do so.

In the same way this prosecuting attorney served notice that he would not prove, even if he could do so, that Colonel Hunt had failed to send a commissioned officer along with the guard if he had been paid not to do so.

The inevitable conclusion is that Bergdoll bought his way out; yet Colonel Cresson, the prosecutor, boldly announced that he would not prove that to be the case even if he could.

That statement by Colonel Cresson clearly shows what a shocking mockery the rest of the trial was.

On pages 16 and 17 of the record of the court-martial trial of Hunt it is shown that the defense undertook to prove by General Harris that he had inspected the prison on Governors Island, of which Colonel Hunt was commandant, on June 11, following May 21, when Bergdoll escaped, and that Colonel Cresson objected to the testimony, but afterwards withdrew this objection and permitted the condition of the prison after the escape to be inquired into, all of which had nothing whatever to do with the case, except to avoid the real issues.

On page 18 of the same record it is shown that the prosecution, without objection to the question, permitted General Harris to testify relative to an inspection of the prison made by him on April 10, 1918, as if the condition of the prison more than two years before the escape of Bergdoll had anything to do with his escape.

Again, that record shows on page 19 that General Harris was permitted, without objection on the part of the prosecution, to testify as to the condition of the prison in April, 1919, more than a year before the escape.

General Harris declined to say that the release of Bergdoll to go find the gold was not a precedent. The case he cited as precedent was where permission was given a prisoner to go to see his dying mother. No instance was cited where a man had ever before been permitted to go hunt for any instrument or for gold; gold buried to aid him in avoiding capture, in the first place, and to be used toward his escape in the next place.

Attention is invited to that part of the answer of General Harris when he said, "It is not infrequent—it is not a common occurrence to give consent for a man to go to his house to recover some effects or papers, particularly papers, but they are always sent under guard." In that sentence we have General Harris saying, first, that it is "not infrequent," and next, "it is not a common occurrence." So, no precedent for the Bergdoll release could be found.

It is to be taken as granted that the permission which was referred to as a precedent, where papers were to be gotten, that they were not such as could be used by the prisoner in effecting his escape, as the gold was to be used by Bergdoll.

On page 24 of the same record, in the testimony of Colonel Penn, we find the following question and answer, neither of which was objected to by the prosecution:

"Q. Up to the time of the 20th of May, this year, what would you have to say as to the administration of the disciplinary barracks by Colonel Hunt; was it satisfactory or otherwise?—A. It had been entirely satisfactory to the department."

Again the question may be asked: What did the administration's opinion of the condition of the barracks have to do with the escape of Bergdoll?

On the same page the following questions were put to Colonel Penn:

"Q. Do you know the reason, Colonel, for the disciplinary barracks being directly under The Adjutant General's Office, and not under the department, as other posts within the department are?—A. I don't know as I can state offhand the reason for that.

"Q. Would you say this, Colonel, that the handling of prisoners who are to serve a year or more require special study, that it was something entirely different from a guardhouse, and therefore required a man who had special training in it and would be in touch with the definite policy that was adopted at Washington?"

At this point the prosecution objected; and, in the course of his objection, used this illuminating and consistent sentence: "I will not raise an objection if you don't insist on that question."

But, after the defense "had insisted" on the question, strange as it may be, the prosecution withdrew the objection. After the objection had been withdrawn it was reput by having the stenographer read it to the witness. Just as soon as the stenographer had finished reading the question, Colonel Cresson, prosecuting, apparently anxious to have it answered for Hunt's benefit, put in and said, "Answer the question, if you can, Colonel."

The above quotation and comment are for the purpose of showing, just at this point, as can be shown in a great number of places further along in the record, that the prosecution nearly always gave way to what was desired by the defense. Usually when he did not give way the court helped out by overruling the objection.

After the witness had ceased to testify for the defense, Colonel Cresson, prosecuting, had the witness to further testify that Colonel Williams, of the Inspector General's Department, had, in May, 1919, a year before the Bergdoll incident, spoken very highly of Colonel Hunt's management of the barracks. The prosecution also had the witness testify that Maj. G. C. Shaw, of the Inspector General's Department, had reported Colonel Hunt's institution to be in excellent condition on May 6, 1920, and that the morale of the officers and enlisted men and prisoners reflected great credit upon Colonel Hunt as commandant of the place. That testimony is to be found on page 28 of the court-martial record.

But, again, the question may be asked: What did the condition of the prison or the morale of the men at any time have to do with the escape of Bergdoll, who did not escape from the prison?

One of the most ridiculous features ever injected into tragedy came when James H. Sparks was testifying. The defense asked whether or not Bergdoll looked like a dangerous man. It is needless to say that the prosecution did not object to having Sparks, a railroad brakeman, venture his scientific opinion along with that already given by the p-s-y-c-h-i-a-t-r-i-s-t. This witness would render the world a favor if he would only describe a really dangerous man merely by his looks.

In addition to the several warnings which had been given relative to Bergdoll being dangerous and liable to escape, Captain Yuill notified the authorities on Governors Island, when Bergdoll was taken there, that he was a very wealthy man and that they should not keep him in the ordinary garrison guardhouse, because in all probability he might bribe his way out.

When O'Hare was on the witness stand in Colonel Hunt's court-martial trial, testifying in response to questions put to him by the prosecution, the prosecution itself endeavored to conceal a material part of the escapade indulged in at Philadelphia, as is shown by the following questions and answers, to be found on page 81 of the court-martial record:

"Q. You got out to Bergdoll's house about what time? Do you remember?—A. I think it was between 11 and 12, the first time.

"Q. In the middle of the day?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you stayed there until how long—how long did you stay there?—A. Oh, must have stayed there—we had dinner there and stayed there until about 2 o'clock.

"Q. What did you do this afternoon?—A. Then took a ride around again in the afternoon.

"Q. Now, skip over to the next day. When was the last time you saw Bergdoll, as you remember it?"

One can not but wonder and continue to wonder why the prosecution wanted to "skip over" the escapade of that night when Bergdoll was taken to the show by the guard and Sergeant York went into the saloon. Could it be that the prosecution was "whitewashing" Colonel Hunt's guards by concealing those incidents because the "suitableness" of the guard was one of the issues confronting Colonel Hunt?

On page 90 of the court-martial proceedings it is shown that while O'Hare still was on the witness stand the prosecution itself volunteered an announcement as follows:

"I think it is proper to appear here that the sergeant is a man that never takes a drink. He has taken no drinks in 19 years."

When O'Hare came to testify before the congressional investigating committee he stated that prior to the Bergdoll affair he did not know Colonel Cresson, who was prosecuting, and that Colonel Cresson did not know him; and that it was impossible for Colonel Cresson to know whether or not he (O'Hare) drank.

Pages 101, 102, and 103 of the record of Hunt's court-martial trial disclose that counsel for Hunt all but abandoned the defense of Hunt, such defense appearing to be unnecessary, no doubt, because of the attitude taken by the prosecution, and commenced the defense of O'Hare and York, who were to be tried later. Presumably he was moved by the old saw that "all three of them might hang separately unless they hung together."

Again, to show that Colonel Cresson, conducting the prosecution, was doing both big and little things to avoid the conviction of Colonel Hunt, the following questions and answers of the court-martial trial, to be found on page 105 thereof, read as follows:

"Questions by prosecution:

"Q. Sergeant, I believe you testified that it was against your orders to go to Canada?—A. Yes, sir."

That to which attention is invited is the fact that the witness had not so testified. The testimony of the witness upon the preceding day is to be found on page 97 and reads as follows:

"Q. In other words, if you got to Philadelphia and met Mr. Gibboney and Mr. Gibboney said you were to go to Canada, you would know that was wrong, wouldn't you?—A. Yes.

"Q. And you would have refused to go to Canada?—A. Yes."

It will be seen that the witness did not testify that it was "against his orders" to go to Canada; but, instead, he said he would have used his own judgment and would not have gone to Canada. So there is another instance where the prosecution, by leading the witness, undertook to have it appear that Sergeant O'Hare did have detailed instructions from Colonel Hunt, when the prosecution was based upon the charge that he did not have such instructions from Colonel Hunt.

Frank Paul Keppel, formerly Third Assistant Secretary of War, was introduced as a witness by the defense to prove that the policy of the Secretary of War relative to the management of the disciplinary barracks at which Colonel Hunt was the commandant was in accord with the policy of Colonel Hunt.

The policy of the Secretary of War concerning the mere "management of the institution" had nothing whatever to do with the escape of Bergdoll at Philadelphia.

The witness was asked further: "Did you yourself make an inspection or two at the institution here?"

"A. I did; two inspections. * * *

"Q. On your second inspection did you find a decided change, or otherwise?—A. My impression is conditions were very much better the second time; the appearance of the place was better; the bearing of the prisoners was better, and it was evident the barracks were administered under a very careful supervision and along a definite policy; I recall that a number of prisoners at that time spent a good part of their time down at the end of the island, not within Fort Williams, but arrangements were made for making themselves useful down at the other end of the island; I don't think that was the case when I was first there."

But what did "the appearance of the place" have to do with the escape of Bergdoll at Philadelphia? Certainly the "appearance of the place" was changed to some extent by Bergdoll's absence.

The witness was actually asked: "Do you know what his (the Secretary of War's) opinion was of the conduct of the institution by Colonel Hunt?"

The opinion of the Secretary of War as to the general conduct of a prison did not excuse Colonel Hunt's refusal of handcuffs, for instance. Yet question after question like that was not objected to by the prosecution.

The defense introduced one McClellan, warden of the Chester County penitentiary, for the general purpose of proving that Colonel Hunt's prison policy was approved by him.

The defense asked him this question: "How did the general policies there compare with that of your institution?"

Even if the question had anything whatever to do with the case, it had not been proven that McClellan was properly conducting his prison at West Chester. Colonel Hunt's policies of managing a prison were permitted to be compared with McClellan's policy of running the West Chester prison, without anybody ever having said how well or how badly the West Chester prison was conducted. But, in order to get Mr. McClellan's and Colonel Hunt's idea of operating a prison, the following is quoted from the former's testimony:

"We have never used—I have never used arms with any guard; I don't allow any guard to carry arms in the institution. It might be well to tell you or the court that our institution is an open one—no walls—and our men work in the open, a mile from the institution at many times. We do not use arms. * * *

"Q. In what kind of a case, with one prisoner, would you consider handcuffs necessary?—A. Well, I would only consider handcuffs in the same light that I would consider a straightjacket—as a matter of restraint."

McClellan and Hunt might have been suitable wardens at a foundling institution, but certainly at no other place. Moreover, McClellan does not permit the word "guard" to be used in his institution; instead he requires everybody to use the word "officer."

In answer to a question this witness, whose testimony seems to have been seriously considered, answered:

"I know very little of Bergdoll.

"Q. You don't know, then, whether it was necessary to handcuff him and send two armed men or not, do you?—A. I don't think that the man lives that it is necessary to do that to if he is a normal man, unless he is insane.

"Q. If it became necessary to transfer a man of dangerous and escaping character, then you believe he should be handcuffed?—A. I don't think so."

If one will read the latter part of page 189 and page 190, which is a part of the testimony of McClellan given at the court-martial trial of Colonel Hunt, he will be utterly astounded at the length to which McClellan would go in conducting a prison. He said, in substance, that he saw no reason why he should take the word of a commanding general that a prisoner was desperate—he would not heed warnings—but would rely upon his own opinion and that of a psychiatrist rather than take heed from a warning or obey orders from a superior authority. Except that Hunt entertained those same notions, Bergdoll might not have escaped.

Another witness in Colonel Hunt's behalf was Capt. Edmund Banks Smith, a chaplain. He stated that he was associated with the prison on Governors Island prior to 1915; that he left there in 1915, but frequently went back. That good man, considering Hunt's administration from the "uplift" or "reform" standpoint, said in his testimony:

"I noticed a slow and gradual changing of what I might term the atmosphere of the prison, rather intangible to describe, but perfectly easy to feel, that appeared to me to show an improvement in the morale of the men."

It may be said, not in a spirit of reproach, that at the time when the chaplain "felt the atmosphere" that Bergdoll was "rather intangible" at Governors Island, where Colonel Hunt presided with such motherly intuitions. Perhaps if the reverend gentleman had then "felt the atmosphere" in Germany he would have found it full of the breathings of defiance and scorn coming from Bergdoll for the American flag.

Bergdoll escaped on May 21, 1920. Colonel Hunt's court-martial proceedings commenced July 21 thereafter. During the two months which intervened between the time when Bergdoll escaped and the beginning of Hunt's court-martial trial Hunt was promoted from major to lieutenant colonel. Then, while the trial was going on announcement actually was made to the court, while in session, that Lieutenant Colonel Hunt had again been promoted, this time to the rank of colonel.

Notice: During the two months immediately following the escape of Bergdoll he was promoted twice.

In the midst of the trial, while Capt. Samuel B. Shackford, a witness for the defense, was testifying, the attorney for the prosecution arose and said to the court:

"To save time, I don't think anywhere in the specification it charges that these sergeants were not competent. I don't think negligence was charged in that way, unless the guard was insufficiently instructed by Hunt. I think testimony along that line might be dispensed with. I am not going to object to it, however, but I want to call your attention to the fact that it is not charged that either of these sergeants were improper men or not good sergeants."

That was a monstrous assertion for the prosecution to make, inasmuch as one of the specifications charged Colonel Hunt with having permitted "Bergdoll to leave said barracks on the date aforesaid not properly and suitably guarded." If they were incompetent or drinkers or negligent they were not "suitable."

The very one whose duty it was to show that the guards were not "suitable" voluntarily stated, in substance, in the above-quoted language, that it was not charged that either of the sergeants "were" "improper men or not good sergeants." Colonel Hunt was directed to provide a "suitable guard," and in the charge it is plainly specified that he did "neglect his duty in that behalf." The prosecution now is helping out the defense by saying by reasonable inference that "improper men" as guards make a "suitable" guard.

The witness testified that Sergeant York "is trustworthy—depend on him absolutely." What a wonderful statement that is, in view of all the facts brought out against him.

Amos T. Baker, one of the p-s-y-c-h-i-a-t-r-i-s-t-s who regarded Bergdoll as so beautifully innocent and harmless, notwithstanding the many warnings as to his dangerous character, really testified that handcuffing "would be humiliating to the prisoner and might suggest to him the possibility of escape." Evidently he was proceeding upon the theory that it had never entered Bergdoll's head to escape. As the handcuffs were not used, and as Bergdoll escaped, it must be that the absence rather than the presence of handcuffs suggested the escape. No matter what the consequence had been, the witness would not abandon his theory. He, with Hunt's approval, wrote a pamphlet concerning the control and guidance of prisoners.

This witness further testified as follows:

"I do recall Major Hunt not wishing to humiliate the prisoner by attracting attention to him by sending a superfluous guard or unduly securing him."

Perhaps if Bergdoll had not been so rich he would not have been so easily humiliated; nor would three men, two sergeants and a commissioned officer, have been deemed a "superfluous guard," nor would the use of handcuffs been considered "unduly securing him."

In one of Hunt's many defiances of authority and advice, he said, "I don't think the War Department is particularly expert in arriving at any decision."

It also appears that Colonel Hunt was not at all averse to being put in charge of the prison at Fort Leavenworth, where Bergdoll would have been sent if he had not escaped. One Grafton B. Perkins, an advertising agent, had in charge this prospective promotion for Colonel Hunt.

While this committee was conducting its hearings, it appeared in some of the western newspapers that one of the committee had expressed the opinion that Hunt had been "whitewashed" at his court-martial trial. Colonel Cresson, who conducted the so-called "prosecution" of Colonel Hunt, telegraphed and asked that the record of the court-martial trial of Hunt be considered by the committee, and that his prosecuting speech also be considered by the committee. He was replied to by wire that both had already been made a part of the record and were considered by the committee. Particularly did he ask that his speech be read to the committee. That request was complied with. Whatever of criticism of Colonel Cresson there is in this report has been gotten entirely from that record, his speech included.

On page 30 of that record Colonel Cresson, prosecuting, said in his concluding speech:

"As I stated in the opening of this case, I want to state again that the prosecution does not for a minute think, nor does it intimate, nor does it care to have anyone think of intimating that Colonel Hunt in any way wanted Bergdoll to escape, that he colluded in the matter or was in any way in any conspiracy."

In another part of his speech he said:

"Of course, the court realizes, as everyone does, that it is not a pleasant duty that devolves on the prosecution in any case, civil or criminal, to come before the court and ask that a brother officer be punished or be admonished or held guilty of neglect of duty."

In that speech Colonel Cresson also said:

"Colonel Hunt has a fine record as a prison officer and the Government is not denying that."

In another part of his speech Colonel Cresson said:

"I have sympathy for Colonel Hunt. He has a fine record, has been retired as a colonel. Colonel Hunt has indeed made a magnificent record as an officer and as to the care of some prisoners. * * * I am glad to be able to say that no one can throw any suspicion of crookedness on the part of Colonel Hunt in this matter."

Several times in this report Colonel Hunt's defiance of the directions of superior officers has been mentioned. It is not desired that this report be closed without having it clearly and distinctly understood that his attitude of "defiance" of orders was feigned, at least in material part, in order to fulfill the understanding arrived at between himself and some of those who saw him at Governors Island a very, very short time before the Thursday when he sent Bergdoll away from the island without handcuffs, without a commissioned officer, without the presence of one of the counsel, without a "properly instructed guard," and without a "suitable" guard. It matters not whether he were really stubbornly defiant of orders or corruptly so, he is guilty, the latter offense being more heinous, only.

Just here it should be emphasized again that the prosecuting judge advocate, Colonel Cresson, declared in the court-martial trial that he would not prove that Colonel Hunt corruptly refused the handcuffs, or corruptly failed to send a commissioned officer with the expedition, or corruptly failed to have one of the counsel accompany it, or corruptly failed to properly instruct the guard, or corruptly failed to provide a sufficient guard, even if he could do so.

Colonel Cresson's contention during the trial was that Hunt was guilty—but only of a technical offense—if he, without taking a bribe, disobeyed orders; but that if he disobeyed orders because he was bribed so to do, then he was not guilty.

Prisoners in making escapes use different instruments. Some use crowbars, some files, some saws, and some false keys. The instrument used by Bergdoll in making his escape was money. Crowbars, saws, and files make noise. There is an old, old saying that "money talks," but in illegitimate transactions like this its talking is done in whispers, and therefore difficult of proof.

No one can be so dense as not to know that Bergdoll could not have been detained at Governors Island for the unusual length of time that he was detained, instead of being sent directly to Leavenworth, without the use of money. Neither can any impartial mind fail to see that his expedition to recover the alleged hidden gold was procured by the use of money. It is fair to assume that every discrimination made in his favor, and that every step taken by him leading to his escape, was the direct result of his immense fortune. If he had not been a millionaire, immediately following his conviction, he would have gone with other prisoners to Leavenworth, where the doors would have been securely closed behind him, unless Colonel Hunt had been successful in his effort to be transferred there.

Because a thing is accomplished by employing a licensed attorney to do it does not necessarily put the act beyond merited condemnation. Money was spent lavishly by Bergdoll for the purpose of ingratiating himself, not only with the prison authorities but with his fellow inmates in the prison at Governors Island. There are many instances where money was used, apparently for legitimate purposes, but surely with the ulterior design of escape. His prolonged stay at Governors Island cost him at least six or seven thousand dollars, and it must be remembered in this connection that it was at General Ansell's request that Bergdoll was permitted to remain there.

The broad, well-defined trail leading to the escape did not become unmistakably evident until General Ansell induced General Harris to authorize the expedition to search for the gold. There can be no doubt about General Ansell's ability and learning, but it is certain that he did not get into the case because of that ability and learning alone. His influence with the Army officers with whom but recently theretofore he had been so long associated must have been considered. The large fee contemplated by him evidently was based not only upon what he might accomplish through legal channels; but, in addition, by exercised influence.

The many fees to be gotten from others, and the big one to be paid by Bergdoll, lured him into questionable paths. No one knew better than General Ansell that his course was, at least, doubtful. His own conscience seemed to have reprimanded him even before this investigation commenced. This is evidenced by the fact that while upon the witness stand, when it was taken for granted by those of the committee that his thoughts had not yet turned to his being a possible "pardon broker," he admitted, by citations to the law in various jurisdictions, that already he was mindful of that feature of the case. Then, when it was undertaken to ascertain to what limit he would not go for a fee, he cited instances in justification of himself where other attorneys had defended notoriously infamous characters. That manner of defense of himself did not first or suddenly come to him while upon the witness stand. This conclusion is based upon the fact that when he, but recently a general in our Army, was confronted with what he had done, he drew from his pocket a written statement, prepared in advance, citing cases, both American and English, to justify his defense of Bergdoll, our country's enemy.

While there are many who participated in the conspiracy leading to Bergdoll's escape and the acquittal of those who brought it about, there are three who are infinitely more culpable than the rest. Those three are General Ansell, Colonel Hunt, and Col. C. C. Cresson. But thus far no punishment has been imposed upon anybody that could not be discharged by the Bergdoll millions and counted a mere trifle.

General Ansell is now out of the Army. He is beyond the jurisdiction of court-martial proceedings, but provision should be made against his future practice before any of the departments, before any court-martial, or in the courts of the District of Columbia or the Nation, above whose safety and integrity he has placed gold.

Colonel Hunt, within the next two months after he had participated so criminally in the escape of Bergdoll, was promoted from major to colonel and immediately retired on the pay of $3,600 a year. It becomes a serious question who is to pay this life-long reward for his perfidy. Those whose backs already are burdened with the most onerous tax ever imposed must contribute; and, in addition, more than 4,000,000 of our soldier boys must, throughout Colonel Hunt's remaining years, contribute to this munficent retirement fund, in recognition only of his instrumentality in this national tragedy. An outraged Nation has the right to demand that Colonel Hunt's annuity be discontinued.

The conduct of Mr. Earl B. Wood should not go unnoticed.

On April 30, 1920, John J. O'Connor, a special agent of the Government in the Secret Service, who had been sent to Philadelphia to look after the Bergdoll case, addressed a letter to Frank Burk, Assistant Director and Chief of Investigation, Washington, D. C.

That letter reads as follows:

"DEAR SIR: On the evening of April 27 Lieut. George C. McDonald, who has been and is cooperating with me in the Bergdoll cases, obtained information through one Jacob Strohm, an uncle by marriage of the Bergdoll boys, that Grover C. Bergdoll is to gain his release within a period of two weeks.

"The information, in substance, is that a Colonel Ansell, a Washington attorney who has been retained by the Bergdoll family to attack the verdict of the court-martial, has guaranteed to bring about the release of Grover C. Bergdoll for a consideration of $10,000. In an effort to gain his freedom, counsel for Bergdoll is expected to apply for the release on bond of Grover C. Bergdoll pending the decision of the court in re application for a writ of habeas corpus, which will give Bergdoll sufficient time to depart from the United States.

"If this can be brought about, it will be a repetition of an application which was made before Judge Hand in the southern district of New York, and at the time of the application counsel requested that the prisoner be turned over to the custody of the United States marshal pending decision. Judge Hand refused the request and ordered Bergdoll returned to the custody of the military authorities.

"If there is some way to prevent Bergdoll's being released pending the decision of the court before which the application will be made, we will have prevented Grover Bergdoll's escape, together with protecting Colonel Ansell, whom I believe to be misled, from having to explain the treacheries of his client and of his confederates.

"Very respectfully,

"JOHN J. O'CONNOR,
"Special Agent."

When that letter reached the department it went to Mr. Wood, he having charge of all correspondence relating to the Bergdoll case.

When Mr. Wood received the letter he should have immediately brought it to the attention of the War Department, which then had charge of Bergdoll, for the purpose of having double precautions thrown around him.

It seems that every happening—whether of act or omission—resulted to Bergdoll's benefit, and not one to his real detriment.

All this could not have been accident. Somebody, carrying convincing persuasives in great bundles, must have preceded every doing in the case, to see that nothing was left to chance.

The opinion is freely ventured that if O'Connor had written the above letter of warning about any military prisoner other than Bergdoll, the millionaire draft dodger, that that letter or its contents would have been sent at once to the War Department.

In the concealment of this most important letter Mr. Wood finds himself with no consolation. There is no one with whom he can even divide responsibility for the offense. Confronted, as he was, when on the witness stand, by that predicament, he did not attempt to do so, as the following questions and answers show:

"Mr. JOHNSON. It (the letter) came to you because you were in charge of this (Bergdoll) particular case.

"Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Have you stated when you received it?

"Mr. WOOD. It is on the letter. It looks like May 3, 1920.

"Mr. JOHNSON. When you received that letter, what did you do with it or about it?

"Mr. WOOD. I went to see the Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Robert P. Stewart, who was not in his office, as I remember it, and I discussed the matter with Mr. Herron, the assistant to Mr. Stewart, relative to what steps we should take if Bergdoll should apply for a writ of habeas corpus, and to take steps to resist the issuance of the writ.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Did you bring the contents of that letter to the attention of anybody else?

"Mr. WOOD. No, sir.

"Mr. JOHNSON Do you take full responsibility for the failure to bring the contents of that letter to the attention of anybody else?

"Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; I take the responsibility. I handled the letter.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Do you take full responsibility for not having brought it to the attention of anybody else?

"Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; I take full responsibility for the way that letter was handled.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Do you take full responsibility for not having brought the contents of this letter to the attention of anybody else?

"Mr. WOOD. I do.

"Mr. JOHNSON. That is all."

Believing that no man of Mr. Wood's most extraordinary make-up should continue in the public service, his dismissal is most earnestly recommended. More, it is recommended that he be forever disqualified from holding any appointive position whatever with the Government of the United States.

It has been said that there is perhaps no crime an exact definition of which is more difficult to give than the offense of conspiracy. It has been defined to be a combination of two or more persons by some concerted action to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful by criminal or unlawful means.

It is not necessary to constitute a conspiracy that two or more persons should meet together and enter into an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful scheme or that they should directly, by words or in writing, state what the unlawful scheme is to be and the details of the plan or means by which the unlawful combination is to be made effective. When two or more persons pursue by their acts the same object, often by the same means, one performing one part of the act and the other another part of the act so as to complete it, with a view to the attaining of the object which they were pursuing, this will be sufficient to constitute a conspiracy. Concurrence of sentiment and cooperative conduct in an unlawful and criminal enterprise and not formality of speech are the essential ingredients of a criminal conspiracy. Previous acquaintance is unnecessary, and it is not essential that each conspirator should know the exact part to be performed by the other conspirator in execution of the conspiracy. Moreover, all the conspirators need not enter into the agreement at the same time. When a new party with knowledge of the facts concurs in the plans of the original conspirators and comes in to aid in the execution of them, he is from that moment a conspirator.

The conspiracy may, of course, be shown by direct evidence, but direct evidence is not indispensable. Circumstantial evidence is competent to prove conspiracy from the very nature of the case. Generally speaking, the crime must be proven by acts of the party himself and of any other with whom it is attempted to connect him.

The evidence in a conspiracy is wider than perhaps in any other case. Taken by themselves, the acts of a conspiracy are rarely of an unequivocally guilty character, and they can only be properly estimated when connected with all the surrounding circumstances. The process is, after all, an inference from one fact to the existence of another.

The crime of conspiracy very, very frequently involves the use of money as a means to its successful accomplishment and, in such cases, as a general rule it is not necessary that direct evidence be adduced of the payment and receipt of the consideration. It becomes a matter of inference from one fact to the existence of another. That is this case.

It must be conceded that the motives which prompted Mrs. Bergdoll, the mother, and "Judge" Romig, the foster father, to take part in the conspiracy were not the motives that actuated either Gibboney, Ansell, Bailey, or Hunt. These latter had no affection for Grover Bergdoll, nor can it be said that his plight aroused their humanitarian impulses. What, then, incited their activities? There was, of course, the Bergdoll fortune ever present.

There are many, many offenses which are, indeed, most difficult of actual proof. There are a few impossible of good except by circumstances and by reasoning from cause to effect.

The eye of man is far more easily deceived than is his mature reasoning and calm judgment. Money may pass from hand to hand in an instant, and at some obscure place, and not be seen. While the passing of it may be proven beyond doubt, the consideration for which it did pass may be disputed. On the other hand, the full performance of the service to be rendered may be fully established; still the passing of the money in payment for the service may be proven only by appeal from the eye to the mental consideration of a chain of established facts. Again, that is this case.

However, no witness willing to tell the whole truth has seen the money actually pass. But everybody who heard or has read the testimony should be able to see an "effect" which could have been produced by no "cause" except money. In reasoning from cause to effect we see the Bergdoll millions, "the cause," standing out like Pikes Peak against the horizon of a rising sun. As the rays of light advance upon each succeeding scene in this unholy affair there is disclosed to the reasoning mind one hideous thing after another, pictured with the accuracy of the camera, until "the effect," the escape, stands out as clearly as the Egyptian pyramids against another horizon.

At first only long and meagerly defined shadows, reaching from the "cause," were cast across the Nation's integrity; but as the rays of discernment and analysis rose higher and higher the shadows shortened and shortened until a black spot stands, and will forever stand, exposed to the light of reason, although none but the guilty may have seen the corrupting influence pass from slacker to traitor.

But with the advent into the case of him who, by his partner, has been modestly declared to be "the highest authority in this country on military law," we find sorcerer-like deception practiced upon the trusting. Next we see a palsied old man, overflowing with that generous spirit of acquiescence and lack of resistance that always accompanies those who grow old beautifully, placed and replaced in artist-like fashion wherever his name could best be commercialized.

Then we find the activities transferred from Washington, which for the then present must be obscured, to Governors Island. This transfer from Washington to Governors Island was so absolute that even an official letter of warning sent from Philadelphia to Washington forecasting Bergdoll's escape within two weeks was hidden away in a pigeonhole, never to find its way to Bergdoll's prison, that he might be properly guarded.

Then we find Bergdoll put into the same cell with a prisoner who is permitted to make almost daily visits to New York, bearing on one occasion, if not on others, a written message to a well-known leader in America against constituted government. Also we find a large sum of money placed at the prison, obviously that Bergdoll might purchase the good will and, perhaps, the silence of guards or the assistance of fellow prisoners.

Next, we see the commandant of the prison turn deaf, dumb, and blind to every direction that might hinder Bergdoll's escape. We see handcuffs denied, and every other official instruction violated. The plighted faith of counsel absconds before the prisoner does, that his going may be the easier. Finally, and as a fitting sequel to this sordid tale, we find that the derelict commandant at Governors Island was prosecuted by one whose shame should be measured only by his days. Following the flimsy pretense—only a pretense—at prosecution, the commandant's fate was given to a court composed of military officers who found him "not guilty" in the face of his own admissions that he had not complied with instructions for the violation of which he was then being tried.

Bergdoll escaped through the misdoing of somebody other than the Bergdoll family and their immediate, personal associates, such as Romig, Stecker, Gibboney, and Mrs. Bergdoll. It is hoped that this report bares to the Congress the others who are more guilty than even the Bergdoll family. Shall they go unwhipped of justice?

The mother, the brother, the foster father—only those who gave shelter and comfort out of love for the black sheep of the family—have been convicted. Shall those who, for money, conceived, connived at, and executed the escape continue to practice in our Nation's courts, to wear the uniform of an officer of our Army, or to collect an annuity from a wronged people?

* * * * * * *

The foregoing part of this report was written shortly after May 24, 1921, when it was thought by every member of the committee that the hearings had been concluded. However, about two months after that date the chairman reconvened the committee for additional hearings. These last-mentioned hearings were occasioned by the receipt of a communication sent by a special agent of the Department of Justice located at Philadelphia to the Department of Justice at Washington. That communication was forwarded to Mr. Peters, the chairman of this committee, under date of June 22, 1921.

The communication of the special agent at Philadelphia was written for the purpose of reporting that he had intercepted a letter written by Grover C. Bergdoll in Germany to his mother, Mrs. Emma C. Bergdoll, at Philadelphia. The communication states, among other things, that the letter ridiculed the seizure of the writer's property by the United States, and that the United States had started something that they could not finish; also that three neutral nations had offered him citizenship. Those statements, and a number of others, are not in quotation marks, but are represented to be a part of the substance of the letter.

That report—a rather lengthy one—embraces in quotation marks the following:

"We made the Americans look like a bunch of boobs before the whole world. They are all laughing at them. * * * You certainly did tell it to the investigators down at Washington, and you deserve credit. Why did you not tell them of the $5,000 which we gave Campbell up at Governors Island? If you did not, I would advise you to make it public, so that the grafters will be all exposed. We are writing a book which gives away the whole swindle from beginning to end, and the American public will wake up when they read it in the near future."

In the report the special agent says the word "decipiatur" was used in the letter, which, as near as he can determine, is a Latin word meaning "a joker."

Two or three weeks after the reception of that communication by the chairman of this committee he sent counsel for the committee to Philadelphia to confer with Mrs. Bergdoll relative to that part of Grover C. Bergdoll's letter suggesting that she tell the committee, if she had not already done so, that they had given Maj. Bruce R. Campbell $5,000.

The chairman of the committee also caused an examination to be made of the account of Bruce R. Campbell and his wife, Laura A. Campbell, at the bank in New York with which they did business. From that examination it was learned that Campbell had purchased an automobile, paying $1,500 therefor, and that also he had deposited with Wasserman & Bro., stock and bond brokers in New York, two sums of money amounting to $6,500. The automobile was purchased by Campbell and the deposits made with Wasserman & Bro. shortly after it was alleged that he had received $5,000 from the Bergdolls.

Upon that information another hearing was had, commencing June 19. In that hearing Mrs. Bergdoll was the first witness. She testified in substance that upon one occasion, shortly after the arrest of her son on January 7, she was at Governors Island, and that she and her son had a talk with Campbell, and that he said that if they would place $100,000 in his hands it could be used with those higher up at Washington and New York to his advantage. Mrs. Bergdoll says that she replied to that proposition by telling him to "go to hell." Then she said that her son Grover put his finger across his lips, indicating to her to be quiet. Continuing her story she stated that thereafter her son Grover asked her to bring to him at the prison $5,000, and that in a few days after this request she went back to the prison taking $5,000 with her, which she delivered to her son. She was most emphatic in saying that she did not know what her son was going to do with the money, and that she never found out afterwards what he did do with it.

She also testified that during the latter part of January or the early part of February, 1920, she was not certain which, while on the boat between Governors Island and New York, Campbell said to her that he had given the money to the proper person, whose name he called, but the name was not remembered by Mrs. Bergdoll.

When Mrs. Bergdoll first testified before the committee, which was about two months before her last testimony was given, she stated in just as positive a way that she had never given Campbell any money, other than $50 with which he was asked to purchase cravats and knickknacks for her son Grover while in prison.

Major Campbell, in testifying relative to that feature, said that Mrs. Bergdoll or somebody closely associated with the family—he was not certain which—gave him a small amount of money, something like $10 or $12, with which to make similar purchases for the prisoner. He says that he left that sum of money with a near-by store, so that Grover C. Bergdoll could get knickknacks with it.

It will be seen that Mrs. Bergdoll testified under oath in her first testimony that she gave Campbell $50 and no more. It is equally important to note that in her last testimony, when an effort was being made to incriminate Major Campbell, she rigidly adhered to that story. The press of the country carried the unqualified statement that Mrs. Bergdoll, when last testifying, stated that she gave Campbell the $5,000; when, as a matter of fact, she stated in no uncertain way that she did not give him the $5,000, or any sum except the $50, and no testimony whatever was produced to show that Campbell got any money except the small amount admitted by him and Mrs. Bergdoll, unless it be proven by his alleged admission to Mrs. Bergdoll while on the boat. If Campbell upon that occasion admitted having received any money and having turned it over to another, there is no testimony whatever showing that he referred to the $5,000 and not to the smaller sum which has been mentioned.

The reflection upon Major Campbell was made, not by Mrs. Bergdoll but merely by the question put to her by her absconding son in the intercepted letter.

An effort was made to corroborate the suggestion made by Grover C. Bergdoll, by showing that the bank account of Campbell and his wife was a very small one, indeed; so small as to forbid the possibility of his having $6,500 to deposit with Wasserman & Bro. in a "bucket shop" transaction. That account with Wasserman & Bro. was in the name of Campbell and his wife.

A young man in the Intelligence Bureau was sent from Washington to New York to examine the bank account of Campbell and his wife. The proper way to have secured testimony relative to that account was to have had some officer of the bank testify from the book entries. In the absence of that manner of establishing the bank account, the next best method was to produce a copy of that account. However, neither of those things was done. Instead, the young man who went from Washington to New York returned, appeared before the committee, and, without the original entries, or without a copy of them, or without a single note or memorandum, testified that he had examined the account and that the largest entry in it was $252.50, Campbell's salary, which was deposited monthly; and that all the checks on that account were small; and that his monthly balances ranged between $7 and $60. Notwithstanding that testimony, the fact was afterwards established from the bank itself that during the very latter part of December immediately preceding the deposit with Wasserman & Bro. there was a deposit to that account of $5,037.

The next piece of attempted corroborative evidence against Campbell was the production of the books of Wasserman & Bro. That account showed that on the 10th day of February, 1920, Campbell deposited with that firm, to the credit of himself and wife, for speculative purposes, $4,500, and that within a few days thereafter he deposited the additional sum of $2,000 for the same purpose.

It should be noticed that our fugitive in Germany had charged, by innuendo, in the letter to his mother that they, meaning himself and mother, had given Campbell $5,000. The assumption was that the $5,000 of Bergdoll money had been used in the Wasserman & Bro. transaction, because Campbell was supposed not to have had other available money.

It must be borne in mind that Campbell did not deposit $5,000 with Wasserman, but that he did deposit $6,500 with them. If he got $5,000 of it from the Bergdolls, the question very appropriately may arise: Where did he get the $1,500 in excess of the $5,000? The answer consistently can be given that he got the $5,000 where he got the $1,500, and Grover Bergdoll does not make pretense that he got more than $5,000, while Mrs. Bergdoll says he got only $50, and he admits that he got something like only $10 or $12.

How very strange it is that the young man who went from Washington to New York to examine the bank account should testify that he had gone through the bank's books, in so far as they related to Campbell and his wife, and found no deposit bigger than $252.50, when, according to the report made by the bank itself, the deposit of $5,037 must have been staring him in the face.

Another remarkable feature in this most extraordinary case is that the special agent of the Department of Justice, located at Philadelphia, did not transmit a copy of the letter, instead of his construction of it. It seems reasonable that his very first act should have been to make a copy of the letter—better still, a photostat copy.

Major Campbell was the attorney designated by the War Department to defend Grover C. Bergdoll at his court-martial trial. The intercepted letter refers to others as having gotten dishonest money, but Major Campbell is the only one in that class whose name has been given to the committee by the special agent at Philadelphia.

Again, it may be asked, since Campbell's bank account was not correctly testified to, is it not equally possible that some name other than Campbell's may have been mentioned in the intercepted letter, while Campbell's name, as already stated, was the only one forwarded to the committee?

Major Campbell testified that he never had any conversation with either Mrs. Bergdoll or her son Grover, or with anybody else, concerning the payment to him of any money other than the small amount heretofore mentioned, and for the purposes indicated. Certainly no one in the whole United States will claim that he is less worthy of credit than any of the Bergdolls, especially that one in Germany, who makes the charge against him.

Campbell's father, now past threescore years and ten, testified in an open, manly way, which carried conviction with his manner, and told how, within his own knowledge, his son had gotten $6,000 in a "friendly gambling transaction."

Major Campbell also testified that he and his wife, not a very great while before the Wasserman transaction, had as much ready money as $24,000. Those statements have not been contradicted. If Campbell's integrity is to be reflected upon in any report that may be made, proof of the charge is challenged. There is not a scintilla of proof against him, except the mere suggestion made by Grover C. Bergdoll in the intercepted letter. The bank account and the Wasserman transaction, which were expected to corroborate the charge preferred by young Bergdoll, have been completely explained away. If there be any who still insist that Campbell got any of the Bergdoll money, let it be said to them that the only testimony given in support was the statement made by Grover Bergdoll to his mother, which, through the special agent, was repeated to this committee.

Those who heard or have read the rambling statements made by Major Campbell when he testified should know that during a part of the hearings he was in the Walter Reed Hospital as a patient; that while in France during the war he was twice gassed; that he was at a military camp in the State of Arkansas when summoned to come to Washington and appear before the committee; that upon his way here he was confronted while on the train by copies of various newspapers stating that Mrs. Bergdoll had appeared before the committee and testified positively that she had paid him $5,000 to be used for illegitimate purposes; and that upon his arrival here he was neither in physical nor mental condition to tell a concise, connected, and lucid story in explanation of the charge. However, in his disconnected and rambling testimony there was no material statement made by him that did not turn out, from other testimony and evidence, to be true.

Those who would criticize Major Campbell are asked only to turn to the testimony given by his old father, and the manner of its giving, and then compare it with the testimony given by any of the Bergdolls or by any of their hangers-on. The one is open, frank, and superlatively candid; that of the others, to mildly express it, is exactly the opposite.

The charges against Major Campbell were made in a most indirect manner by Grover Bergdoll. Bergdoll was not under oath nor subject to cross-examination; and his mother, who was expected to corroborate him, not only failed to do so, but actually contradicted him. Major Campbell assumed the burden of proof and clearly disproved the charges. He is therefore exonerated.

In that part of this report which deals with those whose names became involved in this affair, by the testimony which seemed to have closed on May 24, the testimony of no Bergdoll has been necessary for the conclusions reached. Every adverse criticism of anyone in that part of this report is founded almost entirely upon the acts and omissions of him who is criticized. However, in this, the latter part of this report—that which relates to the Campbell affair—Bergdoll testimony of necessity can not be avoided, and that fact is the apology for treating their testimony with any degree of seriousness.

In conclusion it is deemed proper to commend Thomas W. Miller, the Alien Property Custodian, for the seizure of the Bergdoll property. It is hoped that he will exercise what seems to be his legal right to compel Mrs. Bergdoll to produce the gold which she claims to have buried on the farm near Philadelphia.

The foregoing is respectfully submitted to the House of Representatives for its consideration and appropriate action.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

By House Resolution 12 this committee was directed, in substance—

(1) To procure all facts relevant to fixing responsibility for the escape of Bergdoll from the United States military authorities and for the failure to recapture him.

(2) To determine whether any conspiracy existed to effect Bergdoll's escape or prevent his recapture, and, if so, what persons participated therein.

(3) To determine whether dereliction of duty devolving upon any persons existed which contributed to making said escape possible or hindered recapture.

I.

The committee, by its own action and through counsel and agents, has made exhaustive investigation of facts relevant to the escape of Bergdoll and has examined on oath all witnesses who are alive and available supposed to have any knowledge of or connection with the matter. The testimony of all the witnesses examined by the committee is in printed form in 18 prints of some 1,000 pages, and accompanies this report. A large number of the records and official reports procured from the Department of Justice and from the War Department are on file with the committee and have been examined by it so far as deemed necessary to form its conclusions.

The Department of Justice and every branch of the War Department consulted have furnished every facility for pursuing this investigation and apparently have been desirous of fully cooperating with the committee in its effort to reach the facts.

The committee believes that in accordance with the resolution passed by the House it has made a thorough investigation and procured all facts available relevant to fixing responsibility for this escape and for the failure to recapture.

II.

As bearing upon the question as to whether a conspiracy existed to effect the escape or prevent the recapture of Bergdoll and, if so, what persons participated therein, it may be helpful to summarize the facts surrounding the escape.

SUMMARY OF FACTS.

Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, an American citizen, of Philadelphia, unmarried, 25 years old, worth more than a million dollars, and in good health, on August 11, 1917, having been duly registered, was ordered by the local draft board to make his appearance for physical examination on August 14, 1917.

On August 13, 1917, Bergdoll drew large sums of money from bankers and left Philadelphia and went into hiding to avoid military service.

On July 15, 1918, a questionnaire was mailed Bergdoll to be filed July 22, 1918.

On July 27, 1918, the local draft board reported to the adjutant general of Pennsylvania Bergdoll's failure to submit questionnaire.

On July 29, 1918, the adjutant general of Pennsylvania mailed notice to Bergdoll to report August 8, 1918, at 1 p. m. at the adjutant general's office, Harrisburg, Pa.

On August 13, 1918, the adjutant general of Pennsylvania reported to The Adjutant General at Washington that Bergdoll had been inducted into service on August 8, 1918, and was a deserter.

Bergdoll evaded arrest until January 7, 1920, when he was arrested by agents of the Department of Justice, turned over to the military authorities, tried by court-martial, convicted of being a deserter, and on March 30, 1920, was sentenced to imprisonment for five years. He was confined in the Atlantic branch of the disciplinary barracks at Governors Island, N. Y. He escaped from military custody at Philadelphia on May 21, 1920, under circumstances so extraordinary that the attention of the country has been directed to this case.

The history of the matter from the time of Bergdoll's arrest by agents of the Department of Justice on January 7 until his escape from the military authorities on May 21 is briefly as follows:

Immediately upon Bergdoll's arrest he employed one D. Clarence Gibboney, of Philadelphia, as his attorney, and Gibboney continued to be the principal attorney of Bergdoll until his escape. He was paid $12,500 and was given full authority to employ other counsel. Other lawyers who were connected with the case with Gibboney were Harry Weinberger, of New York; John W. Westcott, of New Jersey; and Samuel T. Ansell and Edward S. Bailey, of Washington. Capt. Bruce R. Campbell was detailed as military counsel for the defendant in the court-martial. Ansell & Bailey, a Washington law firm, of which the senior partner, Mr. Ansell, was formerly a brigadier general in the Judge Advocate General's Department and during the war was acting judge advocate general, resigning in July, 1919, to enter the practice of law in Washington, were retained in April, 1920, after the conviction of Bergdoll by court-martial, for the purpose of obtaining a review by the Secretary of War of the action of the court-martial.

Prior to the retention of Ansell & Bailey in the case counsel had used every means possible to prevent the conviction and sentence of Bergdoll. Insanity had been suggested and habeas corpus proceedings instituted, both without success. Mr. Ansell studied the record, informed Gibboney that his firm would take the case, received $5,000 as a retainer, and proceeded to prepare a brief on points of law involved with the hope of having the proceedings against Bergdoll quashed on review by the Secretary of War. By correspondence and negotiations with Gibboney, who had full authority to fix compensation of counsel, Ansell & Bailey were authorized to believe that if their efforts were successful in the War Department or by further appeal to the civil courts resulting in the release of Bergdoll, they could charge a further fee of some forty or fifty thousand dollars.

An interesting feature in connection with the efforts to obtain a review by the War Department of the proceedings against Bergdoll is the activity manifested by Judge John W. Westcott. Upon reading the brief which had been prepared by Mr. Ansell, Judge Westcott became violently enthusiastic. He mailed a copy of the brief to the Secretary of War with the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7, 1920.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I beg to inclose you a brief in the case of Grover C. Bergdoll. The brief is exhaustive and conclusive. There is not the slightest doubt in the world but that the war authorities made a mistake. I am enormously interested in the situation, and want, if possible, to keep the matter out of the courts. There is very little question but that the Judge Advocate General will properly dispose of the case.

I hope you are very well. It has been a long time since I last had the pleasure of seeing you, but I have kept a very interested gaze upon your work.

Believe me very cordially and sincerely yours,

JOHN W. WESTCOTT.

The cause of Judge Westcott's interest in the case is in dispute. He himself says that his professional ardor was aroused by the inherent merit of the case as elucidated by Mr. Ansell in his brief. On the other hand, it is suggested that his interest was stimulated by a retainer from Mr. Gibboney. It is not particularly within our province to decide the personal controversy between Mr. Ansell and Judge Westcott. It seems certain that Ansell & Bailey believed that Judge Westcott had been retained as associate counsel, and it is probable that Gibboney took advantage of the judge's enthusiastic nature and the fact that he was associated with Gibboney in other matters to get the benefit of his advice and reputation without the pecuniary compensation which he would have demanded had he appreciated his usefulness to the case of Gibboney's client.

As soon as the activities of the lawyers along these lines had ceased by the filing of briefs with the War Department, other activities were instituted by Gibboney in behalf of Bergdoll which finally resulted in his being permitted to leave the disciplinary barracks at Governors Island and obtain what proved to be the opportunity of escaping.

On the day the Ansell brief was filed with the War Department (May 4), at the request both of Mr. Ansell and Harry Weinberger, The Adjutant General sent orders to the commander of the disciplinary barracks not to transfer Bergdoll to Fort Leavenworth, as would be customary in such cases, but to keep him at the barracks at Governors Island. This was on the plea that habeas corpus proceedings before the district court in New York would be taken inside of two weeks, but such proceedings were never taken. The result was that Bergdoll remained at the barracks, however.

On the 7th of May, at Washington, Gibboney for the first time released the "pot-of-gold" story. On that day, having taken Judge Westcott to the office of Mr. Ansell, and having inculcated a belief in the minds of Ansell & Bailey (which was in a large measure borne out by the conduct of Judge Westcott himself) that Judge Westcott was an associate counsel in the case, Gibboney proceeded to relate to them the story that Bergdoll, having previously drawn out from the United States Treasury more than $100,000 in gold, had buried it in the mountains of western Maryland. He now desired to dig it up and place it in banks.

It is astonishing that anyone would believe this story without confirmation. It is a fact that Mrs. Bergdoll, assisted by one Romig, an old friend and confidential agent of the family, did, in October and November, 1918, withdraw $105,000 in gold from the United States Treasury in Washington. Two trips were made by these two persons in an automobile from Philadelphia. Gold certificates were presented at the Treasury and gold coin received in exchange, and with considerable labor transferred to the waiting machine, in which they made their way back to Philadelphia with their precious loads, weighing over 400 pounds. Mrs. Bergdoll testified that this was her own money, and that after taking it home and leaving it under the kitchen table overnight she buried it, though not in western Maryland.

While it is a fact that Mrs. Bergdoll withdrew this gold from the Treasury, neither Ansell, Bailey, nor Westcott made any attempt to verify the story told by Gibboney and made no inquiry at the Treasury as to the withdrawal of gold.

There is no evidence whatever that Grover Bergdoll buried any gold or that he was connected with any gold. Gibboney put forward Romig as authority for the story that Bergdoll had buried gold—the same gold withdrawn from the Treasury—but Romig does not deny that Mrs. Bergdoll withdrew this money and with him took it home to her kitchen in Philadelphia; nor does he dispute her story that she subsequently, alone, buried it. Romig would not say in his testimony that he knew or believed that Grover Bergdoll had buried any gold.

A brother of Bergdoll testified that he knew nothing about Grover having any gold and had no belief that he had buried any.

The story, however, served its purpose. Gibboney had cleverly introduced a suggestion at this meeting in Ansell's office that this gold could be used to pay lawyers' fees and that Bergdoll was the one man who knew where it was. It was necessary that he have a certain liberty of action in order to go and dig it up and put it in banks, which Bergdoll regarded as safer than the ground.

Gibboney's suggestion was that a request be made of The Adjutant General by Ansell for permission for Bergdoll to leave the barracks under guard and go out to Maryland in an automobile for the purpose of obtaining the gold.

On May 10, after the conversation referred to, Mr. Ansell went to The Adjutant General in person and placed before him the request that Bergdoll be allowed to go out for the purpose of hunting the gold. He gave Gibboney as his authority for the story and made the point that Judge Westcott was joining with him in the request. Major General Harris, The Adjutant General, testified:

"General Ansell said that he had discussed the matter with Gibboney, a prominent attorney of Philadelphia, and also with Judge Westcott, and that they firmly believed the story of Bergdoll that he actually had concealed this money in this lonely spot. General Ansell himself stated that he had come to the conclusion that he was telling the truth; that he actually had the money there."

The pot-of-gold story, which had probably started in the imagination of either Bergdoll or Gibboney, had acquired such momentum that when it reached General Harris it had behind it the weight of the alleged belief and influence of former Brigadier General Ansell, who had recently vacated the office of Acting Judge Advocate General; Judge John W. Westcott, one of the most prominent lawyers of the East, who had nominated Mr. Wilson twice for the Presidency; and Mr. D. C. Gibboney, who was represented at that time to be a man of high repute in Philadelphia. General Harris was impressed and asked that the request be put in writing. This was done by Mr. Ansell in the following letter:

"MY DEAR GENERAL HARRIS: Please permit me, in compliance with your helpful suggestion of a moment ago, to place before you in this manner my request, concerning which I have just spoken to you, in behalf of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, together with a brief statement of reasons therefor.

"This man, in virtue of his conviction and sentence as a so-called 'draft deserter,' is now imprisoned at Fort Jay, pending the review of his trial by the War Department. I am his attorney. His home counsel in Philadelphia is D. C. Gibboney, of unexcelled repute as a man and lawyer. Of counsel, also, in a consulting capacity, is Judge Westcott, of New Jersey, whom doubtless the Secretary well knows. These gentlemen visited me last Friday and related to me a situation which we believe to be true and which impels us to submit this request.

"This young man was reared fatherless under family conditions which, even when partially revealed, throw considerable light upon conduct of his that, to say the least, is strange, if not unintelligible. From his father he inherited wealth. Apprehending the family desire to control his share, he at times has openly submitted and at others has become secretive of his wealth. This latter, perhaps, is the most influential of the many complex motives for his action in the instance I now speak of. In any event, it is now known that he did secrete one large sum of money which was recovered a year or so ago. He now declares that he also hid a second large sum, the remainder of his fortune—$150,000—in a lonely spot on the mountain side, distant about a day's journey from the city; that he placed the gold coin in a metallic container and took it himself, unaccompanied, and hid it in a spot which he alone can identify. Circumstances indicate the truth of his statement.

"He is now wrought up with fear and anxiety lest he may never recover the money, and accordingly earnestly asks me, other counsel joining him, to endeavor to arrange it that he may go, under guard and with his counsel, to recover the money and place it in safe-keeping, all expenses to be borne by us.

"We are requesting no privilege—only the necessary liberty of action under guard. This prisoner has no desire to escape, nor could he if he wanted to. Notwithstanding the guard, as his counsel, I stand responsible for his prompt return to prison without advantage to him other than that involved in the object of this request.

"I hope the request may be granted immediately. It seems reasonable and right to me, and also to you, and I hope—and doubt not—that it will seem so to the Secretary.

"May I ask prompt action upon this request? May I also ask that, if possible, knowledge of the contents of this communication, for obvious reasons, be confined to you and the Secretary, and, further, that you notify me personally at the first practicable moment after you have decided upon this request?

"With kind regard for your many courtesies, I am,

"Very sincerely,

"S. T. ANSELL."

General Harris conferred briefly with General March, the Chief of Staff, but General March considered the matter to be entirely within the jurisdiction of General Harris, who had charge of all disciplinary barracks, and gave no consideration to the request other than to glance at the Ansell letter and see who signed it, and told General Harris that "if he thought it was all right, to go ahead." The Secretary of War was never consulted about the matter until after the escape.

At General Harris's direction a letter was written from his office to Maj. John E. Hunt, in command of the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Governors Island, N. Y., inclosing a copy of the Ansell letter, saying that the request had been approved by The Adjutant General and ordering Major Hunt to complete his arrangements with counsel for the prisoner and send him out under suitable guard, with at least one of his counsel, on the expedition purporting to be in quest of gold. It was suggested, but not ordered, that Major Hunt send an officer to accompany the guard. On May 14 a conference was held at Governors Island between Major Hunt, Mr. Bailey (Mr. Ansell's partner), and Mr. Gibboney, when plans for the expedition were agreed upon and the itinerary laid out, by which the party was to proceed by train to North Philadelphia, where Mr. Bailey was to join them and the party was to be met by an automobile and proceed directly to Hagerstown, Md., near the alleged location of the buried gold.

Major Hunt selected two sergeants, O'Hare and York, to take Bergdoll on the proposed trip. One of the sergeants, O'Hare, a day or two before the journey received some verbal instructions from Major Hunt, which were neither understood nor remembered. No other instructions were given him, though a copy of the Ansell letter to The Adjutant General was shown him. The principal thing and practically the only thing that stuck in his mind was that when he reached North Philadelphia on the trip he was to be met by a Mr. Gibboney, who should be identified by a letter which Major Hunt had shown O'Hare, and that Gibboney would tell him where to go. The other sergeant received no instructions whatever. The sergeants had pistols, but no handcuffs. No officer accompanied the expedition. The prisoner was dressed in a uniform which would not distinguish him as a prisoner except to the professional eye. No counsel accompanied the expedition, which never got any farther than Philadelphia.

Arriving at North Philadelphia on May 20, the two sergeants and Bergdoll were met by Gibboney and Romig. Romig had been a local magistrate in Philadelphia and was commonly referred to as "Judge" Romig, had been a friend of the Bergdoll family for years, and without doubt participated in the plans and helped carry out the details of the subsequent escape.

From the moment the two sergeants with Bergdoll were met by Gibboney and Romig in North Philadelphia the two sergeants were completely subordinated, on account of the superior intelligence of Gibboney and Roming and the fact that the sergeants were incapable of action except under orders, and, as they understood their instructions, their orders were now coming from Gibboney. The sergeants were stupid, ignorant, and in a strange place. Sergeant O'Hare, who was in charge of the expedition until Gibboney took charge of it, had never driven in an automobile before. He had only handled prisoners outside the barracks once before, and they were handcuffed and were bound for Fort Leavenworth.

Under the direction of Gibboney the party at North Philadelphia took an automobile (a Bergdoll machine which was there to meet them, driven by a man named Steche, who subsequently fled with Bergdoll) and started toward West Philadelphia. Going down the street Romig told Gibboney that the car was not in good shape for the trip, and Gibboney replied that in that case they had better go to the Bergdoll home. He then told Romig to show the sergeants the Bergdoll home, and left the party in practical charge of Romig, telling the sergeants that he would call them up later and give them instructions. Gibboney then left the party at Broad Street, and from that time until after the escape never communicated, directly or indirectly, with either of the sergeants, nor did the sergeants communicate with him or know where he was.

The remainder of the party—consisting of Romig, the two sergeants, Bergdoll, and Stecher—then drove to the Bergdoll home, Bergdoll taking the wheel and driving himself. Stecher went into the house to see whether his wife, who was expected to cook dinner for the party, had arrived. Apparently no concealment was made of the fact that the party was expected at the Bergdoll home, although, according to the plans for the trip made at the conference on May 14, they were supposed to have driven from North Philadelphia direct to Maryland. Neither Gibboney, Romig, nor Stecher had any luggage or toilet articles or night clothes with them, although the trip was to have taken several days. These various facts apparently excited no suspicion in the minds of the sergeants, who were then acting in the nominal capacity of guards. Romig then said he had to go to court, and the remainder of the party then drove Romig to Fifty-second and Market Streets, where he was left. This was between 9.45 and 10 a. m. of May 20. After Romig left, Bergdoll took charge of the party and drove around town, stopping at one or two places, and returned to the Bergdoll home at 12 o'clock for dinner. Mrs. Stecher had arrived and had cooked the dinner. After dinner the party, consisting now of Bergdoll with the two sergeants and Stecher, reentered the car and drove around the city until supper time. The same car was used which was driven from the station at North Philadelphia and in which Stecher and Bergdoll the next day started for Minnesota. No attempt had been made up to this time to repair any trouble with the car, either real or imaginary. Arriving at the Bergdoll house, Mrs. Bergdoll had returned and Romig joined the party, having been absent all day, and took supper with them.

After supper the party took the automobile and took Mrs. Stecher to her home in West Chester. The rest of the party, including Stecher, Romig, Bergdoll, and the two sergeants as guests, went to the theater and enjoyed the evening. After the theater Romig left the others, and Bergdoll, Stecher, and the two sergeants returned to the Bergdoll home. Mrs. Bergdoll was also there. In making his dispositions for the night Sergeant O'Hare, nominally in charge of the party, slept in a room with Bergdoll on the second floor, he and Bergdoll occupying separate beds. Mrs. Bergdoll slept on the same floor. Sergeant York slept in a room on the third floor. Stecher, the chauffeur, slept on a room across the hall from York on the third floor. Apparently nothing of importance happened during the night, although it is obvious that the two sergeants (one of whom, O'Hare, who appeared before the committee, being noticeably inferior in physical capacity) were completely in the power of the other inmates of the house. Romig joined the party at breakfast about 9 o'clock, and remained with them until Bergdoll escaped.

During the forenoon entertainment was provided in the form of pool in the pool room on the third floor, accompanied by the phonograph and the pianola and graced by the presence of a bottle of gin, which appealed to York but not to O'Hare, who refrained from drinking it. After dinner there was more pool, and then about 15 or 20 minutes before Bergdoll escaped the party was conducted back to the sitting room. In the sitting room then were Romig, Bergdoll, and the two sergeants. Stecher had been outside, ostensibly working on the car. About five minutes to 3 the telephone rang. Bergdoll said he would answer it, and went into the bathroom, diagonally across the hall from the sitting room, for that alleged purpose. After Bergdoll went into the bathroom he was never seen again by either of the sergeants. Apparently the telephone, which had another connection downstairs, was still ringing, and Romig left the sitting room shortly after Bergdoll had left for the announced purpose of answering the phone in the dining room. The sergeants say that shortly after this Romig came upstairs and said, "I do not see those boys anywhere." That referred to Bergdoll and Stecher. Thereupon a search of the house and of the garage was made by Romig and the two sergeants, without result. Then Romig called up Gibboney on the telephone and told him of the escape. Romig testified that Gibboney expressed surprise when told of Bergdoll's escape and said, "I will get a taxi and come right out." He did come out, and arrived in about 20 minutes. Up to this time he was the only person who had been notified of Bergdoll's escape.

Mr. Gibboney has not testified before the committee. He died December 26, 1920. Incidentally, as some question was made as to the accuracy of the report of Mr. Gibboney's death, your committee summoned before it the dentist who identified Mr. Gibboney's body for the insurance people, and your committee is satisfied that Mr. Gibboney is deceased as stated.

Mr. Gibboney's statement, however, was taken promptly after the escape by Col. T. Q. Donaldson, on duty in the Inspector General's Department as assistant to the Inspector General.

In the statement referred to Mr. Gibboney said that he received Romig's telephone message about 10 minutes or quarter past 3; that he arrived at the Bergdoll home about half past 3, and after talking with the sergeants and Romig called up General Ansell at Washington on the long-distance telephone, and also tried to get Major Hunt, and after that he called the department of public safety and the chief of police to notify them of the escape. No authorities authorized to arrest the fugitive were notified until about three-quarters of an hour after Bergdoll and Stecher had disappeared.

Stecher had brought the automobile around and had it ready at the door and Bergdoll had gone through the bathroom by another door and downstairs and into the machine while the telephone bell was ringing. This was on May 21, 1920, at 3 p. m. From that moment all trace of Bergdoll was lost until July 20, 1920.

Immediately after receiving Gibboney's message Ansell walked over to The Adjutant General's office, told General Harris of the escape, and he in turn told the Secretary of War. General Harris did nothing except to call up Major Hunt about 5 p. m. Major Hunt had been informed of the escape about 5 p. m. He reported to the Military Intelligence Department at Governors Island about 5.45 p. m. The Secretary of War had placed the matter in the hands of the Military Intelligence immediately, and about 8 p. m. telegrams were dispatched to all of the five Army departments and the local authorities at Baltimore, Wilmington, and a few other points were notified.

At Philadelphia the local authorities seem to have been notified about 4 p. m., but neither they nor the United States Department of Justice in Philadelphia sent out any broadcast information, and the Department of Justice in Washington, which was notified about 5 p. m., appears to have taken no immediate action. There is no evidence of any information being sent out as to the method of Bergdoll's escape, the description of the car used, or of his companion, until May 29, when a circular was sent by mail to all parts of the country bearing a picture of Bergdoll, describing the car, stating the license number, and offering a reward of $2,500, which had been put up by Ansell.

Many possible clues were run down by United States agents and by detectives employed by Ansell, but no trace whatever of the fugitive was found until Romig, on July 20, brought information to the Federal authorities at Philadelphia that the Hudson car in which Bergdoll had escaped was at St. Vincent, Minn., a little town on the Canadian border. This information was sent Romig by Bergdoll. Investigation made at the time and recently at the request of your committee proved that the car had been abandoned by Bergdoll and Stecher at St. Vincent on May 30; the Pennsylvania license plates had been replaced by Indiana plates; in the car were found two fully loaded revolvers. Bergdoll and Stecher crossed the border and went to Winnipeg, Manitoba, Bergdoll calling himself George V. Riggs and Stecher, Frank J. Johnson. They made application for steamer tickets and for passports.

The passport applications were made out in the ticket office of the Great Northern Railway Co., were taken by the agent (Bishop) to the Royal Bank of Canada, at Winnipeg, and there signed by the manager of the bank (F. W. Doherty), one of the officials authorized by Canadian law to authenticate passport applications. The bank manager never saw either Bergdoll or Stecher, and the ticket agent made only the most superficial investigation of the applicants' identity. The passports came back from Ottawa, Bergdoll and Stecher bought steamship tickets, left Winnipeg for Quebec about June 25 and sailed from Quebec to Liverpool on the steamship Victorian on July 7. Their further movements have not been traced. It was reported to the American authorities on the Rhine in September, 1920, that Bergdoll and Stecher were in Eberbach, Baden, Germany, where they still remain.

CONCLUSIONS AS TO CONSPIRACY TO EFFECT ESCAPE.

Unquestionably a conspiracy existed to effect the escape of Bergdoll from the military authorities. The committee believes this conspiracy was participated in by Bergdoll, Gibboney, Romig, Stecher, and possibly Mrs. Bergdoll.

It does not find that any officer, noncommissioned officer, or private of the Army or any other person connected with the Army, or with the administration of the disciplinary barracks at Governors Island in any way knowingly participated in the conspiracy.

It does not find that any officer, noncommissioned officer, or private, or any other person connected with the Army or with the administration of said disciplinary barracks received any bribe or was approached with a view of bribery in connection with this escape.

Testimony was given by Mrs. Bergdoll to the effect that $5,000 in bills which she had brought to Governors Island and delivered to Grover was paid to Bruce R. Campbell, then a captain in the Army, about February 1, 1920, for the purpose of paying it to people higher in authority, but there is no evidence whatever that if this money or any part of it was paid to Campbell he paid anything to other people. Campbell was the military counsel assigned by the commanding general to defend Bergdoll at his court-martial. It was shown, and undisputed, that Campbell deposited with a New York broker on speculation account $4,500 in bills on February 10, 1920, and $2,000 on March 3, 1920, most of which he lost.

Campbell explicitly denies that he received any money from the Bergdolls, and accounts for the money deposited with the broker by saying that in 1915 he gave $500 in cash to a friend (now deceased) who was a successful speculator, well known for his generosity and fair dealing, and that in 1917 this amount, having grown to $6,000, was sent to Campbell by his friend through Campbell's father, and kept in its original form in bills by Campbell and his wife until the deposit with the New York broker in 1920.

We do not see how this money, if paid to Campbell, had any connection with the escape of Bergdoll or the failure to recapture him, because even if paid it was immediately lost by him and was not paid by him to any person in the Army or connected with the Government. There is no evidence that Campbell was in any way connected with the escape or had any knowledge of the plan.

The acceptance of money under such circumstances by Captain Campbell would be a serious offense, cognizable by the War Department, and we assume that the proper military authorities will institute such investigation as may be necessary to the end that Captain (now Major) Campbell may be exonerated if not found guilty.

Considerable sums of money appear to have been paid by the Bergdolls in counsel fees. Mr. Weinberger received $5,580 for legal services in the trial of Bergdoll. Gibboney was given $12,500, of which $5,100 later went to Ansell & Bailey. Romig was given sums aggregating about $1,000 for expenses, and $700 was deposited with the Army authorities at the barracks for various purchases and expenses for the benefit of the other prisoners. These expenditures appear to have been generally justifiable and to have been applied to the purpose for which they were paid. Weinberger did not know of the gold hunt. Westcott, if he knew of it, seems to have taken no active part in it. There is no evidence that Gibboney applied any part of his fee to bribery. There is no way to trace the amount of money given to Romig, or what he did with it. It was cash; Mrs. Bergdoll kept no adequate books and always had large amounts of cash on hand.

The $5,000 retainer paid Ansell & Bailey was payment for legal services and probably had no influence on the part played by Ansell & Bailey in making possible the treasure hunt which led to the eventual escape. The incident which led to the writing of the letter of May 11 and the other acts of Ansell & Bailey was apparently the desire to make secure the payment of the large prospective fee which Mr. Ansell expected to earn (forty to sixty thousand dollars) by placing in bank under the control of Gibboney the reputed $100,000 of buried gold.

Although Mr. Ansell was no longer in military service and owed no duty except to himself, his actions and attitude seem extraordinary. He accepted employment in the case of a man who was notorious on grounds which to any lawyer are justifiable, but without making any investigation and without ever having seen Gibboney before he accepted Gibboney at his own valuation and fell a willing victim to Gibboney's misrepresentations and machinations, and without making any attempt to verify its truth he indorsed in his letter to The Adjutant General the whole pot-of-gold story. His letter, based on these misrepresentations which he apparently believed, contains statements not true in fact and which were readily susceptible of disproof.

He further states: "This prisoner has no desire to escape, nor could he if he wanted to. Notwithstanding the guard, as his counsel I stand responsible for his prompt return to prison, without advantage to him other than that involved in the object of this request." And in spite of such a guaranty and in spite of the agreement that Bergdoll should go "under guard with his counsel," he took no precautions to assure that the journey would be as agreed and that the prisoner would be returned, and turned the whole affair over to Mr. Bailey and Mr. Gibboney. That both Mr. Ansell and Mr. Bailey relied upon Gibboney is an explanation, but not an excuse.

After the escape it would appear that Mr. Ansell did everything within his limited power to accomplish the recapture of the prisoner. He offered on May 24 a reward of $2,500, which was increased to $3,500, and paid considerable sums to detectives. It is not believed that Mr. Ansell assumed the responsibility he must be charged with because of any bribe or purchase of his services by money, nor is it believed that his motive was improper or that he conspired to effectuate the escape; for one reason, the escape was seriously to his pecuniary disadvantage in preventing him from securing his expected fee for appealing the court-martial conviction. But the letter and the personal pressure upon his former associate, General Harris, were a very important factor in gaining permission given for the trip, and the fact that Mr. Ansell did nothing to carry out his guaranty that Bergdoll should not get away undoubtedly contributed to the escape.

III.

AS TO WHETHER DERELICTION OF DUTY ON THE PART OF ANY PERSONS CONTRIBUTED TO THE ESCAPE OR HINDERED RECAPTURE.

The primary responsibility for the situation which made possible the escape rests upon General Harris. This responsibility he accepts and does not attempt to evade. As Adjutant General of the Army all military prisoners were under his general authority. Bergdoll could not have been let out on his alleged quest for gold without The Adjutant General's consent. There is no question of improper motives on the part of General Harris. It is apparent, however, that his mind was readily overcome by the strong statements of Ansell, and the one essential condition, without which nothing could have been accomplished, and the escape as planned would have been impossible, namely, an order from The Adjutant General permitting Bergdoll to leave prison, could not have been obtained had not General Harris readily yielded to the earnest and artful case put up by his former associate in the War Department, or, having been persuaded to consent, had he ordered, instead of suggested, that an officer accompany the proposed expedition.

Maj. John E. Hunt was in command of the disciplinary barracks at Governors Island, in which Bergdoll was confined at the time of the escape.

When the unusual order came from his superior officer authorizing the departure of Bergdoll, Major Hunt had knowledge of special facts concerning his prisoner, which were unknown to General Harris. Among other things he had been specifically warned three times that his prisoner was a desperate character, likely to attempt to escape. One warning was by the police authorities of Philadelphia, and two others from the Department of the East in command of General Bullard.

Having this knowledge, we hold that Major Hunt should have communicated it to General Harris and ascertained whether, in view of it, he desired to modify his order. If this was not in accord with strict military procedure we think the rules should be changed.

The order from The Adjutant General suggested that an officer accompany the expedition. If that suggestion had been carried out, in all probability the escape would not have occurred.

A suggestion in such a case amounts to an order when it is deemed reasonably possible by the recipient to carry it out. While it would have made Major Hunt short handed to detail one of his officers, in a case like this it should have been done. If not immediately available, an officer could have been obtained from some other place with little trouble.

When Bergdoll left the barracks he was in charge of two sergeants. In the one conversation between Major Hunt and the sergeant in charge before the departure, the question of handcuffs was brought up and the sergeant was told by Major Hunt that he would not need any and that they would make the group too conspicuous. No handcuffs were taken on the trip.

The prisoner was allowed to depart dressed in a uniform hardly to be distinguished from that of a private soldier. Less than ordinary precautions to prevent escape were used, although it was known to Major Hunt that his prisoner was not an ordinary one and would probably attempt to escape. In these respects we think there was a grave dereliction of duty on the part of Major Hunt.

When the selection was made of two sergeants as guards of Bergdoll they should have been first-class men, properly instructed in writing before their departure on such a peculiar errand. The men selected were stupid and entirely incompetent.

A few days before the trip Major Hunt talked briefly wih one of the sergeants. No written instructions were given him. No orders of any kind were given the other sergeant. The sergeant talked with could not remember and did not understand the instructions. He was allowed to think that he was to report to Gibboney and later take his orders from that source.

We believe that in sending out incompetent guards, insufficiently instructed, with the knowledge he had of the prisoner, Major Hunt was guilty of gross negligence that directly contributed to the escape.

Major Hunt, now Colonel Hunt, has been tried by court-martial for his neglect of duty in connection with this affair, and acquitted. We fail to see how a competent and impartial court could reach such a decision. It is certainly a serious reflection upon the court-martial system in the Army.

It is, of course, clear from the foregoing that the sergeants, O'Hare and York, were guilty of grave dereliction of duty in permitting their prisoner to escape from their custody.

They knew enough to know that they shouldn't go joy riding with a prisoner all over Philadelphia, that during the night one should have been on guard while the other slept, and that the prisoner should not have been allowed to leave their presence. Their falling into the hands of Bergdoll's friends and ready acceptance of their orders were the natural consequences of defective instructions, coupled with a lack of natural acuteness. The sergeants were accustomed to act always under orders, and were practically incapable of independent action.

We think that in view of the mental caliber and history of the sergeants they are not so culpable as their superior officer, Colonel Hunt; nevertheless, they are guilty of negligence in the performance of their duties and should have been punished. They were court-martialed and acquitted. This we can not understand. It is no part of our duty to investigate the court-martial, but we think the officials of the War Department would do well to take cognizance of a situation and investigate the conditions under which such acquittals can occur.

Your committee finds a certain lack of efficiency in the efforts of various Government agencies to apprehend Bergdoll after his escape, and a lack of cooperation and coordination between the War Department and the Department of Justice, which should be noted.

Owing to the delay caused by the motoring of Gibboney out to the Bergdoll home, and then calling Ansell at Washington on the telephone, it was an hour before anyone in authority was notified of the escape. It was then obviously too late to look locally for a fugitive escaping in a high-powered automobile; yet no general call seems to have been sent out from either Philadelphia, New York, or Washington on the night of the escape, except short telegrams to the various military departments announcing the escape, but giving no particulars. More prompt and more vigorous efforts should have been made. It is inconceivable that two men, easily described, driving a Hudson supersix car, should have been able to travel from Philadelphia to the northern part of Minnesota without being once intercepted or reported.

No circular giving a description of the fugitives was prepared until May 29, the day before Bergdoll crossed the border. This was an excessive delay, responsibility for which must be placed upon the Military Intelligence Department in Washington.

There appears to have been little or no cooperation with the military authorities by the Department of Justice. The Washington office apparently relied on the Philadelphia office to send out necessary notices, and all the Philadelphia agents were engaged in hunting about the city.

On April 30, three weeks before the escape, John J. O'Connor, a special agent of the Department of Justice, who had been instrumental in the capture of Bergdoll in January, wrote a letter to the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice in Washington, warning of a probable conspiracy to get Bergdoll out of the hands of the military authorities through habeas corpus proceedings, so that he might then escape from the country. This letter appears on page 381 of the record. It was duly received by the Department of Justice, was filed away, and was never communicated to the military authorities.

Assuming that Bergdoll's purpose in obtaining an order to leave the barracks was to flee the country, and not to dig up gold, his path could not have been made easier for him if he had laid it out himself. From the moment he left Governors Island and the conditions surrounding him became apparent he saw that he could depart when ready and without the use of violence. That such a condition existed is, of course, a scandal. We believe, however, that responsibility for it is confined to the persons named and in the degrees we have described. It is a satisfaction to find that it was in no degree due to bribery of any officer of the Army or official of the Government.

To summarize, in conclusion, we believe that, in accordance with the resolution, we have procured all facts relevant to fixing responsibility for the escape of Bergdoll and the failure to recapture him; that a conspiracy did exist to effect his escape, participated in by the civilian persons named and not by officers or privates of the Army or by agents of the Government; and that there was dereliction of duty (caused by negligence and incapacity and not by bribery) on the part of officers and others named which directly contributed to the escape.

JOHN A. PETERS.
C. N. MCARTHUR.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield the two minutes that the gentleman from California has just yielded back, and an additional five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS].

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very glad, indeed, that my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER] has brought to your attention the report made by this committee last August. This committee was appointed to bring, as I understand it, a report to Congress, and Congress can consider that report. That is what the report is for, as I understand it. But since this report was brought in last August, no action has been taken.

Now, we have been meeting here and killing time one way and another, adjourning over Saturdays, and all that sort of thing, and we have had plenty of time in which we could have taken this matter up. I want to say that it is my opinion that the people of this Nation want this matter brought up here and threshed out by Congress.

As indicative of the strong and continuous interest in this matter on the part of the American Legion and all ex-service men and women of this country I wish to quote you from several different copies of the American Legion Weekly.

On page 16 of the American Legion Weekly, of April 15, 1921, we find an article headed "The Bergdoll trail," which is as follows:

When the Government of Baden released from custody Karl Neul and Frank Zimmer, the two Americans who attempted to capture Grover C. Bergdoll at Eberbach and were given prison sentences for alleged usurpation of authority, it did not rid itself by any means of the embarrassing problem into which Bergdoll's presence in Germany has developed. Both the War and State Departments at Washington have been busy on possible ways to obtain the delivery of Bergdoll himself from the German authorities. Although officials at Washington have hesitated to express for publication positive opinions that the United States Government itself can obtain the surrender of Bergdoll, dispatches from London lend strength to the reports that the British Government is willing to demand that Bergdoll be given up for prosecution under its immigration laws. The use of false passports by Bergdoll in passing through Canada and England on his way to Germany is said to be an extraditable offense.

On page 10 of the Legion Weekly, dated April 22, 1921, we find an article headed "Slacker notes," as follows:

The principal hope that Grover C. Bergdoll may be yanked out of Germany by extradition rests at this writing with the Canadian Government. The British Government has ruled that Bergdoll's offense in misusing English passport privileges is not extraditable, but that the Canadian Government does possess sufficient grounds on which to demand Bergdoll's surrender from Germany. It is understood that the Canadian Government has asked the United States Department of Justice for information upon which it may base the legal negotiations necessary to induce the German Government to send Bergdoll back to Canada. If Bergdoll were returned to Canada, it is regarded as certain that he would be shipped across the American border into the hands of American officials.

On page 16 of the Legion Weekly of July 8, 1921, I quote a very striking article, headed "A hero in Bergdoll's shoes":

The memory of the man into whose hands was placed the rifle that Grover Cleveland Bergdoll refused to bear, and who fell in battle overseas, will be honored by Overbrook (Pa.) Post with a fitting memorial. When Bergdoll failed to appear before his local draft board the next numbers on the list were called. The first man to be accepted was assigned to the Engineers and survived the war. The second, Russell C. Gross, of Philadelphia, entered the Infantry in the Eighty-second Division, and was killed in action in the Argonne, winning a citation for bravery in charging a machine-gun nest.

Overbrook Post intends now to change its name to Russell C. Gross Post and to build a community house that will bear the name of the dead hero and will memorialize the soldier and sailor dead of that section of Philadelphia. The community house is to be endowed, in order that it may embody the spirit of American patriotism beyond the lifetime of the Legion, as well as perpetuating the contempt of all fighting men for the arch slacker.

It was through an investigation conducted by Overbrook Post that the fact was determined that Gross was the first man to die in battle after being called ahead of his turn by the defection of Bergdoll.

My friends, has the lapse of time dulled our senses to the awful offense of all those who were in any way accessories to the crime by being in any way connected with the escape of this slacker and arch conspirator, Grover Cleveland Bergdoll? We know full well that had it not been for his gold he would now being doing his time at Leavenworth. That makes it all the harder for the ex-service people to stand—that is, the fact that his gold got him out.

I quote the following from an article on page 16 of the American Legion Weekly of September 2, 1921:

From the start a great hue and cry, partially at least, ascribable to the activity of the slackers themselves, was raised against the searchlight of publicity thrown on the whole ugly business. Persistent efforts have been made to convince public opinion that the War Department's lists were so full of errors that no dependence at all was to be placed in them; that they were so replete with the names of men who served honorably that their publication could in no sense be construed as branding those who really slacked. In numerous instances little nests of slackers have been found busied about a coldly calculative propaganda to keep themselves and their kind out of the pillory of public opinion. According to them, all of the 155,000 are heroes; some of them dead, others wearing congressional medals of honor.

"So pernicious and persistent was this propaganda," The Adjutant General of the Army, Maj. Gen. Peter C. Harris, recently declared, "that had it not been for the influence, prestige, and support of the American Legion, the Secretary of War might have found it absolutely necessary to stop the publication of the slacker lists soon after that publication began. Throughout the whole affair American Legion departments, posts, and members have been of the greatest service and help. They have not only bolstered up public opinion where it was weak and wabbly, but have rendered an immense practical assistance in supplying information for the innocent and against the guilty. The Legion took the patriotic and right position on the publication of the slacker lists, and has maintained it with dignity, force, and effectiveness."

I mention this to bring to your attention more forcibly the fact that I have already stated, and that is that the American Legion is and has been constantly active in trying to bring these slackers to justice, as well as all those who might have been connected with the escape of any such slackers.

Further regarding the case of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, I quote the following paragraph from page 41 of the report we have under discussion—House of Representatives Report No. 354:

In conclusion it is deemed proper to commend Thomas W. Miller, the Alien Property Custodian, for the seizure of the Bergdoll property. It is hoped that he will exercise what seems to be his legal right to compel Mrs. Bergdoll to produce the gold which she claims to have buried on the farm near Philadelphia.

In connection with this particular phase of the case, I quote the following from the record of the proceedings of the last national convention of the American Legion held at Kansas City last November:

REPORT OF AMERICANISM COMMITTEE.

VI. DRAFT EVADERS AND POLITICAL PRISONERS.

Whereas one Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, a prisoner, escaped from the military authorities of the United States Government; and

Whereas the Alien Property Custodian of the United States Government, acting under and by authority of his office, has seized all property belonging to the said Grover Cleveland Bergdoll: Now, therefore, Be it resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That we indorse the action of the Alien Property Custodian in seizing the property and assets of the said Grover Cleveland Bergdoll; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and the Alien Property Custodian.

There is no doubt about the seriousness of this case in the minds of the men and women of this Nation who wore the uniform during the war. People all over the country know the attitude of the ex-service men and women on this proposition. They are interested. They want action now on the part of Congress on this proposition. The ex-service men and women who served during the war are appealing now for action upon this matter.

This report (No. 354) contains certain concrete recommendations. Why does not Congress get busy on this proposition and take it up and thrash it out? That was what the committee was appointed for. Provision should have been made for at least one ex-service man in Congress to have been appointed on this committee. I am told that it was supposed to have been that way, but no ex-service man was placed upon the committee. I do not know why not; perhaps the Speaker knows.

We are making provision here day after day for our heroes. That is all right, of course, and as it should be. But, my friends, in justice to our heroes, we ought also to give attention to our traitors, to our archconspirators, and amongst the archconspirators are many who may have helped to cover up this proposition and put it off from time to time, and especially those who were implicated in the escape of this man Bergdoll. The men and women who wore the uniform will never forget this case. You may think they will, but time will not expunge it from their memory. They want action, and they want it without delay. Why this deplorable lassitude on the part of Congress in connection with this matter? Are we going to continue to be indolent and to sleep supinely on this proposition, or will we show keen and deep interest in this matter, sufficient to see that this report is adopted and these recommendations taken up and handled? Does this appeal find patriotic response in the hearts of the Members of the Congress of the United States, or are we content to let this report stand and time pass on and nothing be done about all these offenders who were implicated in the escape of this archtraitor, Grover Cleveland Bergdoll?

I do not want to take up your time further, but I hope, my friends, that this will be brought up before Congress at an early date and appropriate action taken if Congress sees fit to carry out the recommendations of this committee. Congressional action can do it. I do not mean only about bringing Bergdoll back. There are difficulties, of course, about that; but I would like to see every possible step taken to that end. But your committee has made certain reports in connection with those implicated in his escape, with certain recommendations, and I want to see Congress take up these recommendations and see whether the Congress of the United States wants to put the implicated parties on the rack for their actions in this case or whether this Congress is willing to smooth the whole thing over and overlook the actions of those who were accessories to the crime.

In the language of the Army, I want to say on this proposition, "Let's go; let's have some action and let's have it soon." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in 8-point type the report of the special committee on the Bergdoll matter appended to my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing in 8-point type the report referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman means to insert both the minority and the majority reports?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask for the same permission, to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, two of the greatest needs of the farmer to-day are a good market where he can sell his products at a fair price and a good credit system by means of which he can obtain promptly the money he needs at reasonable interest on fair terms. Recently I have introduced bills seeking to help solve both these important problems. I want the farmer to sell all he can produce directly to the consumer at a fair price, and I want the farmer to get the money he borrows under a system better than he has ever been permitted to use so far. I now want to discuss briefly the bill I have introduced to help the loan situation. First, I want to mention some of the difficulties the farmers are confronted with when they seek a loan either from the present Government rural credit system, or from any of the long-term loan concerns doing business in this country. I hope to remedy these evils by the bill I have offered. Let us see what these trouble are that confront every farmer seeking a long-term loan. First, it takes entirely too long after the application is made to secure the loan. Second, it costs too much to get the loan. Third, a bonus or charge is made for paying off all or any part of the loan before it is due. Fourth, the loan can not be renewed or increased without a new unreasonable expense. Fifth, any part or all of loan paid off before maturity can not be reborrowed during term of loan without extra cost or fee. In order to remedy these troubles and make the securing of long-term loans by farmers easier and more hopeful, I have introduced a bill which I wish now to explain and discuss. The bill is rather lengthy and I will not insert it in full in my remarks. It is patterned after the war finance corporation act, but is called the farmers' finance corporation act. The bill is intended to finance the farmers of the country instead of financing war activities and handling conditions growing out of the World War. The special provisions of the bill which I deem of utmost importance and which I wish to discuss now are as follows:

SEC. 7. The corporation shall be authorized, empowered, and directed to make advances upon such terms not inconsistent herewith as it may prescribe for periods of 10 years from the respective dates of such advances to persons engaged in farming, truck raising, gardening, fruit growing, or stock raising. The advances shall be made upon farm lands and improvements as collateral security or upon unimproved lands taken in connection with improved lands. Any person authorized to secure advances under the provisions of this act who contemplates seeking such advances or loan may file his application, have his title approved, and have his proposed farm security inspected and approved for the full amount that may be advanced upon the proposed security, without securing any loan at the time of the application or immediately thereafter. The applicant for loan may at once execute and have recorded a loan deed securing the corporation in the full amount for which his property is approved and may thereafter at any time within 10 years execute his promissory note or notes to the corporation for any amount, in multiples of hundreds, not in excess of the amount specified in the loan deed, and there shall be immediately advanced to the borrower the amount of the note or notes. The borrower shall be permitted to retain as an approved credit any amount specified in his loan deed not covered by his outstanding notes and may from time to time execute additional notes, in multiples of hundreds, and secure additional advances until the full amount for which his property is approved as specified in the loan deed is borrowed.

SEC. 8. The borrower may at any time and from time to time pay off in multiples of hundreds any amount the borrower desires to pay on the said loan. The amount so paid off may be reborrowed in whole or in part at any time during the 10 years' period specified in the loan deed.

SEC. 9. The interest charged on advances under this act shall not be in excess of 5 per cent per annum and shall only be charged on the money actually obtained and only for the time the money is actually retained.

SEC. 10. The corporation shall make arrangements with the local banks in each community to pay cash to the borrowers for the notes executed in accordance with this act, and the corporation shall honor the drafts of such local banks for the amount of such note or notes so paid.

SEC. 11. No commissions, bonuses, abstract fees, or other charges shall be made or demanded by any Government agent or other person for services in helping secure money or repayment privileges under the provisions of this act except a reasonable inspection fee and abstract charge may be only made for approval of security and certification of title when application is first filed.

SEC. 12. The borrower at any time he desires upon payment of a reasonable charge for inspection may have his farm property reinspected to determine whether or not in view of increased values and recent improvements he is entitled to an additional approved credit value. If he is entitled to the additional loan, he may execute necessary supplemental loan deed and have the privileges of this act to the full amount thus aprpoved.

Mr. Chairman, I will not quote more of the bill now. The sections just read are self-explanatory and would cure the evils of the present long-term loan systems. I want the farmer to be permitted to have his loan approved for all his property will carry and then be permitted to get the money as he needs it. I want him to be allowed to pay back any amount he wishes and stop interest on money he does not need and then reborrow any amount paid back when he needs it. I want him to be allowed without extra expense to borrow and pay as he pleases so he stays within the limit his property is approved for. I want him to have cheap money promptly when he needs it and only be forced to keep it and pay interest while he needs it. I want the farmer after his loan is approved not to be required to take the money until he needs it; then when he needs it I want him to be able to walk into any bank, execute a note for any part of loan he may need and immediately get the cash for the amount of the note from the bank. I want him to be allowed without extra cost to come to this bank when he wishes and repay the amount he owes in whole or in part and then reborrow when he needs it. I am sure the banks throughout the country will gladly cooperate in the operations under this bill. Especially is this true of the country banks.

The banks would know that the farmers had an approved credit for thousands of dollars on their farms and would gladly make any advances for a short time the farmers might need, knowing that the farmer could secure money from the Farmers' Finance Corporation any day to take care of his note to the bank. The banks would gladly cash the farmer's notes under my plan and draw on the corporation, for the the money would be handled through the bank and much of it left there for deposit. The farmer's credit would be so much better when it was known he had an unused approved credit with the corporation which he could use any day. The amount the farmer had to his approved credit would be worth as much to him as though he had it in hand or on deposit, for he would know he could get it any day, and yet it would cost him nothing in the way of interest until he called for it. This bill would help the farmers and help every one that the farmers do business with. It would help the credit of the farmers. The creditors of the farmers would more gladly carry the items due them by the farmers and the farmers could more easily carry the items due them by others. The whole country would be benefited. A confidence of great value would be established. This bill if enacted into law would be a great shock absorber in times of depression or panic. All the country banks have a large number of farmers who are stockholders, directors, and other officials. Let one of these banks be about to close its doors for lack of ready cash while its directors, stockholders, and creditors have many times the amount of money needed by the bank as approved credit under the terms of this bill and what would happen? There never would be a minute's danger of the bank closing. The whole country would be much safer from financial depression and panics. The farmers would be encouraged to keep as large an approved credit as possible to be used in emergency. At present, if a farmer seeks to borrow money, he suffers agonies before he gets it. He pays too much for it. If he gets only what he needs, he later may need more and can not get it. If he gets more than he needs, he pays interest on what he does not need. If he wants to pay back part, he must pay a bonus for the privilege, and if he wants to reborrow later he must face a new commission and another long delay.

Mr. Chairman, I am very anxious for the loan provisions which I have just quoted to be enacted into law. I do not care so much whether they are part of a law establishing a new government agency or keeping the War Finance Corporation functioning under a new name or as an amendment to the present Federal rural credit system or otherwise. What I do want is for the farmers and the country to get the benefits which I am sure will flow from the enactment of the loan provisions offered in this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I yield 50 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 50 minutes.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the State and Justice Departments that prepared the bill which is now before the Committee of the Whole House. There were no witnesses before that subcommittee at its various hearings who were not Government officials, except one individual by the name of Wayne B. Wheeler, who appeared saying that he was general counsel and legislative superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America. He desired to give his views regarding the disposition of funds in relation to the Department of Justice concerning the enforcement of prohibition. Before he made any statement he was examined at length, particularly in relation to the conformity of the Anti-Saloon League of America to the Federal statutes relating to the prevention of corrupt practices at Federal elections. You can read the evidence that has been printed in connection with those hearings.

As a result of the evidence he gave, there has been an examination made. The result of that examination and investigation is so important and has developed such facts that I believe the facts should be laid not only before this House but before the Department of Justice.

A law was enacted June 25, 1910, and amended August 19, 1911, and is one of the several laws to prevent "corrupt practices" at Federal elections. It is entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected." The first section of this law reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the term "political committee" under the provisions of this act shall include the national committees of all political parties and all committees, associations, or organizations which shall in two or more States influence the result, or attempt to influence the result, of an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected.

This law provides for detailed statements of money received in amounts of $100 or more, amount, name and address of the person from whom received, and money expended, with the name and address of each person paid $10 or more.

This law also provides that these detailed statements shall be made under oath and filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives not less than 10 days before the election, and on each sixth day thereafter until the election, and another report to be filed within 30 days after the election. The law carries a penalty of $1,000 and imprisonment of not more than one year, or both.

No such statements were filed by the Anti-Saloon League of America or by any of its State branches, departments, or subsidiaries in 1910, 1912, 1914, 1916, or 1918.

In 1920 for the first time three returns were filed by Wayne B. Wheeler, signing himself as "Treasurer, campaign committee, Anti-Saloon League of America"; three by the "Anti-Saloon League of America, Department of West Virginia"; three by the "Anti-Saloon League of Maryland"; and only one return each by the "Wisconsin Anti-Saloon League," the "Anti-Saloon League of Colorado," "Anti-Saloon League of Oregon," and the "Iowa Anti-Saloon League."

The first return signed and sworn to by Wayne B. Wheeler was dated October 22, 1920, the second October 29, 1920, and the third December 1, 1920. Upon each of these returns was indorsed the following protest: "We respectfully protest any obligation on the part of the Anti-Saloon League of America to file this report under the above law, as the activities of the league are educational, scientific, and charitable rather than political as intended by the law. We file this report, therefore, under protest, covering those contributions and expenses in connection with the national organization in the election of Congressmen as indicated in the report."

The congressional districts in the first return, dated October 22, 1920, in which "the Anti-Saloon League of America" admits under oath it spent money, were the fourth and fifth districts in Indiana, the eleventh district of Iowa, the sixteenth district of Texas, the seventh district of Minnesota, known as the "Volstead district," the thirteenth district of Missouri, the first and second districts of New Hampshire, the first, second, and forty-second districts of New York, the tenth, twentieth, twenty-second, twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth districts of Pennsylvania, and the first and sixth districts of Maryland.

The congressional districts in the second return, dated October 29, 1920, in which the Anti-Saloon League of America admits under oath it spent money, were the seventh district of Minnesota, known as the "Volstead district," the fifth district of Ohio, eleventh district of Maryland, twenty-fifth and twenty-eighth districts of Pennsylvania, the fortieth, forty-first, and forty-second districts of New York.

The law requires "the name and address of each person to whom any payment is made in excess of $10 or more." In each of the three reports of the Anti-Saloon League of America this provision of the law is violated in relation to some items.

Under date of November 4, 1920, Elizabeth Roberts, "bookkeeper and assistant treasurer" of the Wisconsin Anti-Saloon League, in the only return made by that league, states under oath, under the head of "Expenditures on behalf of candidates," a strictly political expenditure according to the return, that R. P. Hutton, of Milwaukee, had his "salary paid by the Anti-Saloon League of America, Westerville, Ohio," but does not state the amount.

In none of the three returns signed by Wayne B. Wheeler as "Treasurer, campaign committee, Anti-Saloon League of America," does any such person's name appear, nor is any amount traceable or returned under any possible item in these three returns as being so expended by the Anti-Saloon League of America, although they purport to be the entire expenditures of the Anti-Saloon League of America, made in connection with the congressional election of 1920, which not only would involve a violation of the act of June 25, 1910, which requires a detailed account of expenditures, name, address, and amount paid, but also involves a sworn false return, as the two returns are contradictory.

The structure of the Anti-Saloon League is as follows: There is a corporation known as the Anti-Saloon League of America, which is the national organization, and corporations in each or most of the States and the District of Columbia, known either as the Anti-Saloon League of that particular State or as the Anti-Saloon League of America, department of the State in which it is incorporated, and the national organization and the State organizations make one association or organization by the closest affiliations possible.

Vice presidents of the national organization are presidents, directors, or trustees of the various State organizations, and most of the national executive committee hold office in some State organization, which is also true of the national board of directors, and the national committee on financial management has one member who is on the headquarters committee of a State organization. As an example, William H. Anderson is a State superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York. He is also a member of the national executive committee and also of the national legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America.

This scheme of organization, the closest which American corporate law can devise, is known as the system of interlocking directorates and makes of such corporations in effect, so far as action and policy are concerned, one large corporate entity.

The plain intent and purpose of the law is to give publicity in Washington to all expenditures made by any committees, associations, or organizations attempting to influence congressional elections in two or more States. If any money is expended to influence an election in two or more States, the law, by the plainest language which could be employed, demands a return in form be made to the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

There can be no question that this law applies to any organization that attempts to influence an election, no matter what other activities the organization may have, because the law says so.

The expenditures of the national organization and of the State organizations with which it is affiliated or interlocked, attempting to influence the election of Congressmen, must be reported here in Washington as the activities are national and coordinated or the law is nullified.

Therefore any expenditures made for this purpose should be disclosed in a sworn report filed by the "committees, associations, or organizations," either through full returns at Washington made by the national organization, including expenditures of all its State branches in each report required by law, or by reports from the national organization and separate reports from each State where money is received or expended.

Nullification of the law would otherwise result through the formation of a national organization spending little or nothing in congressional elections and with its affiliated or interlocking State branches or departments in each State spending vast sums, about which there would be no report made in Washington as required by the law and its manifest intent and spirit.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TINKHAM. The following organizations filed reports in connection with the 1920 election without protests that the law did not apply to them in their political activities:

Republican National Committee.
Democratic National Committee.
Republican National Congressional Committee.
Democratic National Congressional Committee.
National Committee, Single Tax Party.
Prohibition National Committee.
National Committee, Socialist Party.
Farmer-Labor Party of the United States.
Oklahoma State Democratic Committee.
Republican Senatorial Committee.
Harding-Coolidge Republican League No. 1.
National Non-Partisan Political Campaign Committee.
National Campaign Committee of the Sixteen Associated Recognized Standard Railroad Labor Organizations.
National Young Men's Republican League.
Harding-Coolidge Uptown Dry Goods Association.
Debs Campaign Conference.
National Welfare Union.
American Federation of Labor, National Nonpartisan Political Campaign Committee.
Pro-League Independents.

At this point I desire to draw attention to the fact that there has been recently issued by Parker Shields, superintendent Tennessee Anti-Saloon League, a leaflet asking for liberal contributions to this league, from which the following is a quotation:

> A number of Congressmen who hold the balance of power and pile up majorities in Congress come from the Southern and Western States, where money for organization and educational purposes is scarce. They have always had to have help from the national league.

This would clearly show that the Anti-Saloon League was systematically and liberally financing congressional campaigns and placing Congressmen of the United States under obligation to vote in Congress in accordance with its dictation.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. This is an important matter. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. TINKHAM. Let me finish my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will yield to me for half a minute——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. TINKHAM. I will answer any question that the honorable Representative from Ohio desires to ask when I have finished my statement without interruption.

Another quotation is as follows:

> In addition to the above, the amount from Tennessee for the national league helps to provide for the maintenance of the entire national organization. It also helps to provide for the maintenance of our national office at Washington, D. C., under the very successful management of the Hon. Wayne B. Wheeler, one of the greatest diplomats and attorneys in America. From this office needed legislation is initiated, a constant watch is kept on the actions of Congress, and when opposition appears danger signals are flashed to every State in the Union.

Legislation initiated in the national office of the Anti-Saloon League in Washington and not in the Congress of the United States! To what degredation, to what debasement has Congress fallen that its shame can be thus heralded to the world!

There, verily, is an end of free institutions and free men. Cowardice, indeed, has completed their destruction and dishonor.

In connection with this general subject it may be of interest to the House of Representatives to know that in the Evening Star, Washington, Tuesday, March 21 last, in an interview, Samuel W. Small, secretary of the National Reform Association, is quoted as stating that that association has "a pledged financial income of over $2,000,000 annually," and that it was proposed to spend this amount at the next election in the congressional districts of the United States.

On page 472, part 2, of the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations relating to the Department of Justice, the following colloquy occurs:

Mr. TINKHAM. I did not think you had given your personal opinion as to whether or not you thought that the corrupt practices act applied to the Anti-Saloon League if it attempted to influence elections in two or more States. I do not think you have replied to that question.

Mr. WHEELER. I think that the national organization, as such, working in various States the law might be construed to cover that; and inasmuch as it can be construed that way, the only fair thing for us to do was to accept that construction until it was otherwise held.

Notwithstanding this statement by Mr. Wheeler, no returns were filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives by the Anti-Saloon League of America or by any of its State branches, departments, or subsidiaries in 1910, 1912, 1914, 1916, and 1918.

I therefore charge that the following are violations of the act of June 25, 1910, as amended by the act of August 19, 1911, to prevent corrupt practices at Federal elections:

1. Failure to make returns to the Clerk of the House of Representatives by the Anti-Saloon League of America or any of its State branches, departments, or subsidiaries in 1910, 1912, 1914, 1916, and 1918.

2. Failure to give names and addresses of all persons receiving $10 or more in the three returns filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives by Wayne B. Wheeler as treasurer campaign committee, Anti-Saloon League of America, in connection with the congressional election of 1920.

3. Failure of the Anti-Saloon League of America, department of West Virginia, to give names and addresses of all persons receiving $10 or more in the three returns filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives in connection with the congressional election of 1920.

4. Failure of the Anti-Saloon League of Maryland to give names and addresses of all persons receiving $10 or more in the three returns filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives in connection with the congressional election of 1920.

5. Failure of the Wisconsin Anti-Saloon League to file more than one return with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and in that return to give the names and addresses of all persons receiving $10 or more in connection with the congressional election of 1920.

6. Failure of the Anti-Saloon League of Colorado to file any return under oath with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and without the names and addresses of all persons receiving $10 or more in connection with the congressional election of 1920, although a letter admits expenditures.

7. Failure of the Anti-Saloon League of Oregon to file more than one return with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and failure to file that return under oath in connection with the congressional election of 1920.

8. Failure of the Anti-Saloon League of Iowa to give the names and addresses of all persons receiving $10 or more in the return filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives in the one return filed in connection with the congressional election of 1920.

9. Complete failure to file returns with the Clerk of the House of Representatives of numerous other State branches, departments, or subsidiaries of the Anti-Saloon League of America which received or disbursed money in connection with the congressional election of 1920. Notably the State of New York, the State of Pennsylvania, and the State of Minnesota.

10. That under date of November 4, 1920, Elizabeth Roberts, "bookkeeper and assistant treasurer of the Wisconsin Anti-Saloon League," in the only return made by that league states under oath under the head of "Expenditures on behalf of candidates," that R. P. Hutton had his "salary paid by the Anti-Saloon League of America, Westerville, Ohio," and in none of the three returns signed by Wayne B. Wheeler as "treasurer, campaign committee, Anti-Saloon League of America," does any such person's name appear, nor is any amount traceable or returned under any possible item in these three returns as being so expended by the Anti-Saloon League of America, although they purport to be the entire expenditures of the Anti-Saloon League of America made in connection with the congressional election of 1920 and that they are contradictory statements made under oath.

The records of the Clerk of the House of Representatives disclose a failure of the Anti-Saloon League of America and its subsidiaries to obey the Federal statutes, not only in one case but in many.

Nothing can shatter the very foundations of society, its respect for the law, and its belief that laws are to be obeyed than to have a great national organization refuse to obey laws that apply to it.

No more deadly thrust can be given to law and its enforcement than the claim of immunity from criminal statutes of general application by any one class, interest, or association.

No greater contempt of law can be shown than by reliance upon schemes to circumvent the plain meaning of a law and its spirit. American courts of justice have never allowed this to be successful. Interlocking directorates have been abolished and legal moral responsibility placed where it belonged.

The usual course for a Member of Congress to pursue in a situation such as has been disclosed is to ask for a committee of investigation of the House of Representatives. I, however, know as well as anyone who has knowledge of the House of Representatives that it would be absolutely futile for me to ask for the appointment of such a committee, as such an order of investigation could not be passed because of the power of the Anti-Saloon League of America and its influence in the House of Representatives.

I, therefore, publicly request, yes, I demand, that the Department of Justice, which I believe can not be intimidated or subverted by political influence and threats of reprisal from whatever source, and whose first duty is to enforce laws of the United States, investigate the facts which I have here submitted and upon finding that they are true to institute proper proceedings under the law.

This I do to the end that all laws shall be enforced equally against the politically powerful as well as against the politically weak, that laws passed to insure the purity of the ballot shall be given their full vigor and effect, and that impartial justice shall be respected and maintained in these United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. In a minute. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 24 minutes.

Mr. TINKHAM. There have been two captious criticisms made concerning the hearing at which Mr. Wheeler was examined and the printing of the record of the hearing which I think should be answered and explained to the committee.

The first is the criticism that I should not have examined Mr. Wheeler as I did.

Mr. Wheeler was a volunteer witness who requested to appear before the committee. He made no objection to any of the questions asked, nor did any member of the committee. That should dispose of this criticism.

The second criticism is that the record of the hearing was not printed as it should have been.

The facts are these: That Mr. Wheeler was given permission by the committee to correct his testimony. As a member of the committee I had the right to correct my questions. Two copies of the record were brought to my office. One the original, with the corrections of Mr. Wheeler, and the other a copy, although it looked like an original so far as the typewriting was concerned. I dictated my corrections to a young man who had for six weeks been acting as my secretary, who was not very familiar with the correction of records. He made my corrections upon the copy instead of upon the original, and the copy with my corrections was returned to the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations and in due time this was printed. Saturday last Mr. Wheeler made discovery that his corrections were not in the printed hearings, and the matter in due course was brought to my attention. I found the original with Mr. Wheeler's corrections in my office, took it immediately to the Committee on Appropriations, and a reprint of the testimony with Mr. Wheeler's corrections as well as my own is now before the committee. That should dispose of this criticism.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. It seems he has made a very careful investigation, as he says, relative to the activities of the Anti-Saloon League. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether, while he was working along that line, he made any investigation of the activities of some other organizations, especially one known as the Association Opposed to National Prohibition; whether they had any large sums of money accumulated to influence the election of Congressmen in certain congressional districts?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have made no investigation as to the activities of any other associations, because the representatives of no other associations except the Anti-Saloon League appeared before the committee. Had they appeared and had there developed the same testimony that was developed in the examination of Mr. Wheeler, I should have included it in my statement to the House, and I would say that if there are any organizations whatsoever, no matter for what purpose they may be organized, that participated in congressional elections in two or more States and attempted to influence results and have filed no returns under the law, they are equally guilty of violating the corrupt practices act with the Anti-Saloon League of America and its subsidiaries.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows that there is such an organization. Was there not a statement inserted in the RECORD at your hearings relative to that question?

Mr. TINKHAM. It was inserted after the hearing, not at the hearing. Mr. Wheeler was given the right when the hearings were over to put certain statements into the RECORD.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. There are a great many organizations that are opposed to national prohibition. Is not that a fact?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have heard that that is so. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman fully realizes that they are spending a large amount of money, that to-day they are organizing in nearly every State in the Union for the express purpose of trying to defeat Congressmen who will not pledge themselves to the modification of the Volstead Act. I should like to ask the gentleman if he believes these organizations can work without the expenditure of large amounts of money?

Mr. TINKHAM. I think I should not be asked a question of that character. I will say this: I have no exact knowledge of what organizations may be operating to-day in the United States which are opposed to or which desire to change the Volstead Act. If there are organizations, I do not care what their character is, whether they favor prohibition, or are against prohibition, whether they are organizations of churches or organizations of bawdy houses, if they attempt, under this law in more than two States to influence congressional elections, a statement of their receipts and expenditures must be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and should have been filed since 1910 when this Federal statute was passed. The statute says "all committees, associations, or organizations." This is without any distinction whatever. Does not that fairly answer the question of the honorable Representative from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit me, this is what I want to say to the House, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has put a large amount of work into the statement which he has given to this House to-day criticizing the Anti-Saloon League for their activity in politics. Now, I think if the gentleman here had been fair he would have looked deeper into the question, and he would have investigated the activity of those organizations that are opposed to the prohibition laws, and that to-day are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in anticipation of defeating Congressmen for election this fall who will not pledge themselves to a modification of the Volstead Act.

Mr. TINKHAM. If any Representative of those organizations had come before the committee of which I am a member I would have asked him the same questions that I asked Mr. Wheeler, and if I found that his testimony was similar to Mr. Wheeler's I should have made a similar investigation; but Mr. Wheeler was the only witness, and he came there voluntarily, and I took up that specific case. The committee was not an investigating committee, and I am not an investigator.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman if he has read that part of the testimony which was inserted in the hearings?

Mr. TINKHAM. As a matter of fact, I have not had time.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit me, I notice here that the budget called for in the association opposed to national prohibition contemplates the expenditure of not less than $600,000. Then, in another place, it says:

Before a wheel can turn, the managing director must know that there is at least $200,000 in the treasury.

Now, I wish the gentleman would take the time to investigate those organizations—the association opposed to national prohibition.

Mr. TINKHAM. What is the date of that statement?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. This statement was incorporated in your hearings on this bill before the committee.

Mr. TINKHAM. What is the date of that particular statement?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It does not give the date; but there is such an organization.

Mr. TINKHAM. If the representative of that organization had appeared before the committee, I should have made an investigation of that organization.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do the records filed by the Anti-Saloon League under the corrupt practices act, or the gentleman's investigation, show how much money was expended by the Anti-Saloon League in the election of Representatives in Congress, and for what purpose, and in what districts?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have given the districts, and I am going to ask the House to allow me to incorporate in the extension of my remarks three returns of the Anti-Saloon League of America, and the one return of the Anti-Saloon League of Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. The latter is the one in which I am particularly interested, because of the activities of certain bodies which failed to comply with the State law requiring returns, that have used thousands of dollars against me in times past. I wish to ask whether that return shows anything of the activities in any specific districts of the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. TINKHAM. This particular return of the Anti-Saloon League of Wisconsin does not show any particular activities in any particular district, except that it has attached to it as a part of it a specimen ballot in which certain Senators and Congressmen are designated and described and certain others otherwise designated and described. That I wish to have printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent.

The total expenditure as returned by the Anti-Saloon League of Wisconsin is $10,028.83.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does it give the districts in which the money was expended?

Mr. TINKHAM. It does not give the districts in which the money was expended, but the Anti-Saloon League of America has indicated, as I have read, in what districts the Anti-Saloon League of America expended money.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will ask the gentleman another question. I notice in the hearings on page 468, in which are enumerated certain districts in Minnesota, Ohio, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York, in which the Anti-Saloon League was active in the last campaign, that after the New York districts appears the language—

Omitted by error from former reports.

That conveys the idea that in a former report there were further districts returned. Has the gentleman any list of those districts?

Mr. TINKHAM. The districts in the first report, filed October 22, 1920, of the Anti-Saloon League of America, are as follows: Indiana, fourth and fifth districts; Iowa, eleventh district; Texas, sixteenth district; Minnesota, seventh district; Missouri, thirteenth district; New Hampshire, first and second districts; New York, first and second districts; Pennsylvania, tenth, twentieth, twenty-second, twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth districts; Ohio, fifth, tenth, and eleventh districts; West Virginia, first and sixth districts; Maryland, first and sixth districts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Were those funds used in favor of candidates or were they used in opposition to candidates?

Mr. TINKHAM. This is what the return says:

The above amounts were expended in the following congressional districts to aid in the election of Congressmen opposed to the nullification of national constitutional prohibition.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will yield to the honorable Representative from Maryland.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: As I understood the gentleman, he said that the Anti-Saloon League of America is a corporation, and filed three separate reports signed by Wayne B. Wheeler, treasurer, showing expenditures of money to influence the election of Members of the House of Representatives. Is that correct?

Mr. TINKHAM. It is; but he signed his name as "treasurer, campaign committee, Anti-Saloon League of America."

Mr. HILL. Treasurer of the campaign committee?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Is this the same Wayne B. Wheeler who appeared before the Appropriations Committee and was questioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. TINKHAM. He is the same gentleman who appeared before the subcommittee which was formulating the State and Justice Department appropriation bill now before this committee.

Mr. HILL. Can the gentleman state for what purpose the treasurer of the campaign committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America appeared before the Appropriations Committee of this House?

Mr. TINKHAM. He appeared apparently not for political purposes. He appeared to advise the committee in relation to the policies that the committee should pursue and the sums of money that should be designated for the enforcement of prohibition and limitations to be put on language in the bill.

Mr. HILL. I notice that the gentleman refers to expenditures made by Wayne B. Wheeler, treasurer of the Anti-Saloon League of America, in the seventh district of Minnesota, and the gentleman referred to it as the "Volstead district." Is that the district represented by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House?

Mr. TINKHAM. If I am not mistaken, that is the district represented by Mr. VOLSTEAD.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, is it in order for me to object to the attorney's leading the witness? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I will say that I am trying to elucidate the truth for the benefit of the House and the Nation. I hope the gentleman will continue to make the same illuminating answers to the rest of my questions. [Laughter.] I would like to ask the gentleman if Wayne B. Wheeler, whom I see in the gallery at the present time—and I saw him in the gallery when the medical beer bill was voted on—whether this Wayne B. Wheeler is the same one who appeared before the Judiciary Committee as legislative agent of the Anti-Saloon League?

Mr. TINKHAM. I understand he is the same.

Mr. HILL. I want to ask the gentleman one more question. Does he think it is proper that the man who spends the money to elect Congressmen should come and ask favors of the legislative committee?

Mr. TINKHAM. What does the honorable Representative mean? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I would like to put my questions in a different form since I see that the gentleman is so reluctant to answer. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it proper that a gentleman who becomes treasurer and spends money to assist in the election of Members of Congress should be at the same time a legislative agent and go before this same Member of Congress in whose election he has assisted and ask for legislation for his employer corporation?

Mr. TINKHAM. It seems to me highly reprehensible that a man should allow his campaign expenses to be paid in part by any organization whatsoever which he knows in advance is coming before the committee upon which he sits as a member, or particularly as the chairman, to ask for legislation of any character.

Mr. HILL. I entirely agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. MANN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this Anti-Saloon League, organized as a corporation in a particular State, is obliged to make a return in reference to elections of Members of Congress?

Mr. TINKHAM. In reply let me state what the organization of the league is.

Mr. MANN. I heard the gentleman's statement.

Mr. TINKHAM. There is a national organization, known as the Anti-Saloon League of America, and it has subsidiaries or departments in every State of the Union. Many of the offices of the national organization are also offices of the State organization. It has an interlocking system.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman this question, a simple one, and get a simple answer, and I think I understand what it will be: Suppose the Anti-Saloon League in Massachusetts is organized under the laws of the State of Massachusetts and expends funds wholly within the State of Massachusetts with reference to the election of Members of Congress, does the gentleman insist that the corporation must make a Federal return?

Mr. TINKHAM. If it is interlocked with the national association, of course; else it would be a repudiation and nullification of that law.

Mr. MANN. Then I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Does the Massachusetts State Republican committee make any return with reference to its expenditures?

Mr. TINKHAM. The law provides, specifically, that only the national committees of all political parties and the national congressional campaign committees of all political parties shall make returns, thereby excluding the State committees. But there is no limitation put upon the other "committees, associations, or organizations." The law provides that such "committees, associations, or organizations" shall report their entire expenditures.

Mr. MANN. If it is not interlocked with the national Republican committee, then I do not understand its purpose.

Mr. TINKHAM. The law specifically provides for returns only of the regular political national committees; but there is no limitation upon other committees so far as State expenditures are concerned.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Is it not a fact that as to the two pieces of legislation, or the limitations, to which Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler directed his request, the gentleman himself consented to their being incorporated in the bill; and are they not now in the bill before the House?

Mr. TINKHAM. Oh, yes; I agreed to what was suggested. It is a reasonable suggestion.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. A few moments ago the gentleman from Massachusetts asked me a question as to where I found the statement I was reading to him. I would state to the gentleman that he will find the statement concerning the activity of the Association Opposed to National Prohibition, together with the amount of money they are supposed to have on hand before they can turn a wheel, and so forth, beginning on page 491, of part 2, of the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations on the Department of State and judicial appropriation bill. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to make an investigation of the activity of that organization, and if he finds anything wrong I would like to have him report their wrongdoing to Congress.

Mr. TINKHAM. I shall take the suggestion of the honorable gentleman from Ohio under consideration. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated with my remarks the first, second, and third return of the Anti-Saloon League of America and the returns of the Wisconsin Anti-Saloon League. Otherwise those papers may be lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

OCTOBER 22, 1920.

Authorized and published by Wisconsin Anti-Saloon League, 825 Goldsmith Building, Milwaukee, Wis.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] makes a jewel of inconsistency. He is best known to fame for his vigorous insistence that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States shall be in force and full effect; that there shall be a most rigid enforcement of, and compliance with, those amendments; but as to the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, he joins with a multitude of other gentlemen in the country in looking for some way to get that amendment out of the Constitution without repealing it. He favors any kind of legislation that will evade the full effect of that amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I would rather proceed. I have only 10 minutes in which to answer a 50-minute speech.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just wanted to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts does not seem to be as anxious to enforce the fourteenth and the fifteenth amendments of the Constitution in Boston as he is in South Carolina.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is another jewel of inconsistency. Having held a hearing of 40 pages, an investigation, if you please, of the Anti-Saloon League, represented by Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, and that investigation having shown to any reasonable man that the Anti-Saloon League is the only organization with reference to liquor that has paid any decent respect to the election law, the gentleman forthwith proposes that we shall indict the officers of that organization which has complied with the law; but as to the other 20 or 30 organizations opposed to prohibition, who are shown by the record the gentleman himself has made to have violated that law—ignored it—the honorable gentleman says he has nothing to suggest.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am sorry I can not. As I say, I have but 10 minutes in which to answer a 50-minute speech.

A jewel of inconsistency! The gentleman from Massachusetts said in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] that the reason he does not ask any action against associations opposed to prohibition is because he does not know anything about their activities. His own record shows the evidence, and I will say to the gentleman that if he never had a chance until this morning to read that statement in full in the printed record it is because of a very embarrassing and unfortunate accident in his own office. It would have been in print a week ago except for that accident in the office of the gentleman himself whereby important portions of the testimony of Mr. Wheeler did not appear in the first edition of the hearings before the gentleman's subcommittee. He does not know of any wrongdoing on the part of all these other organizations, and still the testimony brought out by him from Mr. Wheeler shows that this Association Opposed to Prohibition, to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] refers, has been active in influencing elections. I read from the statement of that organization in 1919, to be found on page 493 of the "second edition" of the hearings before the gentleman's subcommittee:

As to the Federal prohibition amendment all the lawyers who have been consulted are unanimous in the statement that it is illegally a part of the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the United States Supreme Court will declare it null and void. But the members of the United States Supreme Court are extremely sensitive to public opinion. They must be made to feel the weight of public opinion that has been aroused all over the country by this attempt to prohibit, by constitutional amendment, the natural and inherent rights to free men in a free country. That sentiment can only be crystallized by the expenditure of a very considerable sum of money, and the Association Opposed to National Prohibition has nowhere near enough money to prosecute the campaign.

Mr. Chairman, if there is no law that would require them to make a report of how much money they used in their effort to influence a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States there ought to be a law, and I am surprised that the gentleman has not introduced such a law. Further, in the gentleman's own testimony brought out from Mr. Wheeler, on page 497 of the second edition of the hearings, there appears a list of liquor organizations between the years 1910 and 1920 that participated in congressional elections. That list is as follows.

United States Brewers' Association, 50 Union Square and 109 East Fifteenth Street, New York City; National German-American Alliance (Inc.), 419 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.; National Association of Commerce and Labor, Chicago, Ill.; National Retail Liquor Dealers' Association; Model License League, Louisville, Ky.; National Association of Manufacturers, St. Louis, Mo.; National Liquor League of the United States, Hugh A. Harvey, chairman congressional committee, Washington, D. C., 1912; National Federation of Retail Liquor Dealers; Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association.

I read further from that same page of that same testimony which appeared before the gentleman's committee and was brought out by his own questioning of Mr. Wheeler:

The German-American Alliance and the brewers operated with an organization known as the National Association of Commerce and Labor, of Chicago. The political methods of this organization are set forth at length in the investigation made by the Senate Judiciary Committee, under Senate Resolution 307, of the Sixty-fifth Congress. You will find on page 1263 of the report of the hearings the detailed information which they secured by State surveys of each Congressman, his connections and the methods by which they attempted to influence votes, and their plans for securing nominations and elections of Congressmen.

You will find on pages 117, 289, 134, and 1312 a long list of business concerns that were boycotted because they would not aid the liquor organizations. You will find on pages 459 to 462 the sample reports of the political agents who worked for these liquor organizations. These reports disclose the political methods used by the German-American Alliance, the Brewers' Association, and the National Association of Commerce and Labor in influencing the election of Congressmen. The methods by which they raised their funds for carrying on the campaigns, and the defrauding of the Government of taxes which were used for corrupt purposes in elections, are disclosed on pages 85, 342, and 401; also on page 1077.

The methods by which they controlled newspapers and, in many instances, bought them in secret is set forth on pages 656, 701, 657, 675, 658, 462, 70, 73, and 458. The methods by which these organizations controlled the foreign-language press to carry out their program is revealed on pages 466, 471, 467, 621, 996, 557, 595, 551, and 630, etc.

The brewery connection with the "No beer—no work" campaign is set forth on page 199.

These organizations, interested in the election and defeat of Congressmen, at no time after the year 1910 complied with the Federal corrupt practice act.

Several thousand pages of testimony were taken revealing the political methods of these organizations, and the conclusions of the committee will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 14, 1921, on pages 8603 to 8608. In the face of this testimony the attempt to find fault with the only organization that has complied with the law is unjustifiable.

If the gentleman has not read that it is because he has not made good use of the testimony brought out by himself, and the reference there given to page 1263 of the Senate hearings, giving the detailed information which the wets secured by State surveys of each Congressman, 100 questions about every candidate for Congress in this country, his connections, the method by which they attempted to influence votes, whether the man was in debt and the church to which he belonged, and so forth; the reference to the page showing a long list of businesses and concerns that were boycotted. You will find on page 459 to page 462 sample reports of the political agents who worked for these organizations. If he will look at the two volumes of Senate hearings lying on yonder table, he will find reason for the indictment of those organizations and abundant evidence already available to prove the active participation, country wide, by these wet organizations in elections, who, by the gentleman's own statement on the floor to-day, have filed no reports, as required by law. Mr. Chairman, there has been an investigation of those liquor organizations, as Mr. Wheeler called to the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, conducted by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. That subcommittee made a unanimous report, and that unanimous report received the unanimous approval of the full Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate and was accepted by the Senate, condemning those liquor organizations and their participation in politics in the most unmeasured terms, as shown by the following extract from the committee decision as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD September 5, 1919, page 5187:

The allegations and charges made in said Resolution No. 307, hereinbefore set out, in regard to the brewing and liquor activities, were substantially sustained, as will appear from the printed record, volumes 1 and 2, herewith transmitted.

Your committee in entering upon the investigation directed by said Resolution No. 307 interpreted that resolution as requiring an inquiry into two subjects, to wit:

1. The conduct and activities of the brewing and liquor interest, political and otherwise, was specifically demanded; and

2. A general inquiry into pro-German propaganda and activities was required. The testimony taken having been printed, a review thereof is deemed unnecessary. Complying, however, with the mandate of the resolution requiring a report of the results established by the investigation, the following findings are herewith submitted for the information and attention of the Senate:

I.

With regard to the conduct and activities of the brewing and liquor interests, the committee is of the opinion that the record clearly establishes the following facts:

(a) That they have furnished large sums of money for the purpose of secretly controlling newspapers and periodicals.

(b) That they have undertaken to and have frequently succeeded in controlling primaries, elections, and political organizations.

(c) That they have contributed enormous sums of money to political campaigns in violation of the Federal statutes and the statutes of several of the States.

(d) That they have exacted pledges from candidates for public office prior to the election.

(e) That for the purpose of influencing public opinion they have attempted and partly succeeded in subsidizing the public press.

(f) That to suppress and coerce persons hostile to and to compel support for them they have resorted to an extensive system of boycotting unfriendly American manufacturers and mercantile concerns.

(g) That they have created their own political organization in many States and in smaller political units for the purpose of carrying into effect their own political will, and have financed the same with large contributions and assessments.

(h) That with a view of using it for their own political purposes they contributed large sums of money to the German-American Alliance, many of the membership of which were disloyal and unpatriotic.

(i) That they organized clubs, leagues, and corporations of various kinds for the purpose of secretly carrying on their political activities without having their interest known to the public.

(j) That they improperly treated the funds expended for political purposes as a proper expenditure of their business and consequently failed to return the same for taxation under the revenue laws of the United States.

(k) That they undertook through a cunningly conceived plan of advertising and subsidation to control and dominate the foreign-language press of the United States.

(l) That they have subsidized authors of recognized standing in literary circles to write articles of their selection for many standard periodicals.

(m) That for many years a working agreement existed between the brewing and distilling interests of the country by the terms of which the brewing interests contributed two-thirds and the distilling interests one-third of the political expenditures made by the joint interests.

The gentleman talks about this Chamber being dictated to by the Anti-Saloon League. The gentleman knows there is no organization that can dictate to this body of men. [Applause.] And the gentleman knows that if any resolution should come from him for an investigation of those organizations that his own questions brought into the hearings and which are shown to have violated the election laws, there will be very few votes here on the floor against it from those that respect the Anti-Saloon League as the recognized force that binds together through effective leadership the sentiment of this country of ours that is behind the eighteenth amendment. [Applause.] When the gentleman attacks Wayne B. Wheeler, when he attacks the Anti-Saloon League, I am not concerned about Wheeler or the Anti-Saloon League, but I think of those millions of faithful men and women all over this country that thank God for the eighteenth amendment and are now praying nightly for its enforcement, that this Republic may be the greater. And in so far as the Anti-Saloon League fairly represents that constituency it is entitled to the respect of Congress. Not until the gentleman shows that they have betrayed their constituency has he any right here, after they have fairly explained all their doings, to charge them with violations of this law while shutting his eyes to the real violators of the law.

The gentleman talked about the "deadly thrust" at law and order in this country that was brought about by some one or other. The deadly thrust at law and order in this country comes from those liquor organizations who were declared by a committee of the United States Senate, in that unanimous report of its Judiciary Committee, to have been guilty; that they have undertaken and frequently succeeded in controlling primaries, elections, and political organizations, and not one of them has ever filed a report under the law of which the gentleman speaks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose the degree of seriousness with which the House regards the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Hon. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM, would justify very extended remarks in reply; but it seems the more sensational and ridiculous a statement is, coming from a Member of Congress, the more publicity it obtains in the United States, and I have no doubt that the charge which has been made by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] will, as occurred with reference to the hearings, receive wide publicity throughout the United States. Unfortunately, the people of the United States who are not on the ground and are not in the galleries have a very poor opportunity to observe the relative proportion of things that happen on the floor of the House. Sometimes they are liable to be misled by the headlines that usually are found above sensational statements like the one to which we have referred. It would be an interesting thing, if it were possible, to analyze the mental gyrations of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts. He was a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which was framing this bill for appropriations for the Department of Justice. During the deliberations of that committee, to determine how much money ought to be appropriated for the Department of Justice, Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler asked for permission to come before it. I am not a member of the Anti-Saloon League; I have never contributed to its support in my life, and, so far as I know, it has never as an organization supported me in any race I have ever made for office.

I am not interested in the controversy between Mr. Wheeler and the gentleman from Massachusetts, but he has the right, as any American citizen has the right, to ask to come before the Committee on Appropriations or any other committee and to make statements in behalf of the appropriation for the Department of Justice for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment or upon any subject before a committee. And while I do not know why he asked permission to go before that subcommittee, I have a suspicion that the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts was on the committee may have had some influence in determining the propriety of asking and, if necessary, insisting that the Committee on Appropriations should give the Department of Justice all the money that it needed and asked for in order to enforce the eighteenth amendment and all other laws. But, at any rate, Mr. Wheeler went before the committee, and before he was permitted to open his mouth, before he was even permitted to say "Mr. Chairman," the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] took him in charge and cross-examined him, as if he were a crap-shooting negro, before he was permitted to make the statement before the Committee on Appropriations which he came to make.

Mr. EVANS. And not a single question he asked was material to the subject being investigated.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman gives evidence of the fact that he is thoroughly familiar with the questions.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Reading a part of the hearings before the committee, Mr. Wheeler made this statement in the presence of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts. He said this:

Mr. WHEELER. I have already stated our viewpoint of it, and the fact that there might be some doubt with reference to it is the reason why I have asked our committee to file these reports; we are the only organization that does it. I find no criticism of the many liquor organizations that are doing the same thing for not filing a report.

He said this:

We are the only organization that does it—

That is, had filed a report on expenditure. I find no criticism of the many liquor organizations that are doing the same thing, namely, not filing reports. Mr. Wheeler stated that they had filed reports.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. The fact is that the Anti-Saloon League, to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has directed his remarks, is the only organization, either for or against the eighteenth amendment, that has filed any report with the Clerk of this House.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts becomes profound and serious when he has discovered that perhaps in some technical way Mr. Wheeler did not make his report as full as he thinks it should have been. But we hear no word of condemnation against those who filed no report at all.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield with pleasure to my equestrian friend from Maryland. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that all such organizations that attempt to influence the result of national elections should file reports in accordance with the law? I will say to the gentleman that I think they ought to file them.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is but one answer to that question. Of course, if there is any organization in the United States that is spending money in two or more States to influence the election of Members of Congress they ought to report, and I hope that the new organization, with which I think the gentleman from Maryland is in sympathy, the Association Opposed to National Prohibition, which has established headquarters in Washington and which has announced that it proposes to take a hand in the election of Members of the Sixty-eighth Congress, will file reports as required by law, and if it does not file reports the gentleman from Maryland, I hope, will be as active in trying to enforce the law and seeing to it that it does file reports as the gentleman from Massachusetts is in regard to the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. HILL. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I shall include such a provision in the bill that I hope to introduce to-morrow morning.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad the gentleman is taking time by the forelock, and hope he will help to see that all laws are enforced.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has entertained us for an hour. Whatever he talks about has in it sufficient amusement to furnish entertainment to the House. But the gentleman from Massachusetts has taken this time, as he says, in order to emphasize his fundamental objections to the violation of law. In an article which appeared in the New York Evening Telegram recently over the gentleman's signature and under his handsome picture, he laid stress on the fact that the danger that now confronts the United States of America is the disregard for and the disrespect of law. I think in some respects the gentleman is right, though I do not agree to his premise. But while he was talking about the little, insignificant error he thinks committed by the treasurer of this league, on which he pounced for not giving some name—and I do not know whether that is an error or not, although he seems to enlarge on the point of not having given the name—yet during his speech and in all the gentleman's years of activity and service he has failed to denounce organizations that are seeking to undermine the laws of the United States, organizations that announce that they propose to take a hand in the campaign for the election of the next Congress, and will try to elect men who are pledged to repeal the prohibition act, and defeat Members of Congress who favor its enforcement, and ultimately will seek to secure the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. The gentleman from Massachusetts has never denounced this open and flagrant propaganda for violation of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. BARKLEY. The disrespect for law in this country, which is liable to undermine the foundations of our Government, is not some innocent, unintentional disregard of a ministerial statute which requires merely the filing of reports with the Clerk of this House. The violation of the law and the disrespect for law that may undermine the foundations of our Republic and finally land it on the highway of nations as a wreck, as the gentleman predicted in the newspaper article to which I have referred, is that kind of violation and disrespect which holds in contempt the law of the land, the fundamental law of the land; disrespect in the minds of people who sympathize with those who undertake to create a sentiment against the enforcement of the law. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will make his investigation a little more fair and his activities a little more universal than he is now seeming to do, and without regard to the character of the law or amendment that Congress enacts will join hands with us not only in seeing that the laws are enforced but that there is maintained in the United States a healthy sentiment among the people of our Nation that respects and reveres every law of the Nation and of all the States. [Applause.]

The real trouble that confronts this Nation is not the failure of some benevolent organization to cross a "t" or dot an "i" in its report. One of the menaces to our institutions is the disregard and disrespect of law, to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has contributed as much as any Member of this House. [Applause.]

In this connection I wish to incorporate in my remarks an editorial written by William J. Bryan on "The enforcement of prohibition":

[From editorial in next issue of the Commoner.]

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION.

Acquiescence in the will of the majority when expressed in accordance with our Constitution and our laws is the vital principle of our Government. Jefferson said that acquiescence in the will of the people was the vital principle of the Republic from which there is no appeal except to force, the principle of despotism.

That acquiescence in the will of the majority is the recognized policy of this country can be proven by innumerable facts in our history. For instance, in 1876 the Democrats acquiesced in the election of a Republican President by a majority of one in the Electoral College when that one majority was secured by a decision of the electoral commission which voted eight to seven on every important question. In 1884 the Republicans acquiesced in the decision when Cleveland was elected by the vote of New York and the vote of New York turned upon a few hundred votes. In 1916 the Republicans again acquiesced in the decision when President Wilson was reelected by a small majority in the Electoral College and that majority came from California which went Democratic by a few votes.

Here we have three instances of acquiescence in the election of Presidents by a narrow margin. Although great interests were at stake there was no suggestion of resistance to the decree rendered according to the Constitution and laws. And yet we find a large element, made up of some who claim respectability, resisting a prohibition law based upon a constitutional amendment adopted by a large majority after a fight of 50 years. No important question has ever been settled by so decisive a majority as that recorded in favor of prohibition. More than two-thirds of the States in the Union went dry by their individual act. More than two-thirds of the Members of the Senate and House voted to submit prohibition. Forty-six States out of 48 have ratified prohibition. Only two States, Connecticut and Rhode Island, have refused to ratify and they are small States, and in the largest of these one branch of the legislature favored ratification. Two Congresses have been elected since national prohibition was submitted—one since prohibition went into effect—and both of these Congresses have been dry by more than two-thirds majority.

And yet, instead of acquiescing in the will of the majority, the "wets" in city, State, and Nation are attempting to elect men to office pledged to violate their oath. They are trying to prevent the enforcement of the law and also trying to secure legislation which they know to be a violation of the prohibition amendment.

So bold are these enemies of Government that they insolently warn the Federal Government not to interfere with open conspiracies in neighboring nations and on the high seas. A Philadelphia paper recently insisted that the Federal Government should not interfere with rum runners outside the 3-mile limit. What a doctrine to preach in this enlightened age! The geographies teach us that three-fourths of the earth's surface is covered by water. The "wets" would confine civilization to one-quarter and turn over three-quarters of the earth's surface to those who are outlaws and who are engaged in conspiracies against governments.

Whenever a ship puts the black flag above the flag of any nation it can be sunk without fear of war. No civilized nation will lend its flag to the violation of the law of any other nation, and it will not protect its citizens when they disgrace their country and their country's flag by such kinds of piracy.

"Freedom of the seas" in this case will be "freedom to seize"; the nations that attempt to protect their homes from the invasion of alcohol will be prepared to seize those who attempt to use the seas for unlawful purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield 20 minutes to the Commissioner from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA].

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, some days ago I heard two gentlemen from Kansas raising their voices in defense of E. Mont Reily, Governor of Porto Rico. According to my information the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] does not know E. Mont Reily. If that is the fact, I exonerate him; but the other gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], who is not my personal friend but who is a close friend of Governor Reily, knows the governor very well. I am sorry I can not exonerate him. It seems to me that there is some similarity between the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] and E. Mont Reily. The Governor of Porto Rico is called a "strong" man, and the gentleman from Kansas is STRONG, "too." There must be something in common between these two strong men, although I will say that there is nothing strong in Reily's favor except the gentleman from Kansas. But while the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] seems to be very active in defense of his close friend, E. Mont Reily, I have not heard a word in his defense from the gentlemen in this House from Missouri. There are 14 Members of the House on the Republican side from the great State of Missouri. I would like to hear a word from them, and especially from the gentleman from Kansas City [Mr. ELLIS], who comes from the same district as Governor Reily. He ought to know Reily better than any other Member of Congress. Let him take the floor of the House. I invite him to take the floor of the House right now, and I will yield the balance of my time provided he says something about E. Mont Reily. It would be extremely interesting. But I see the gentleman from Kansas City remains silent. Is not that an admission? Is not that a confession? I really believe so.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield? I do not happen to be from Kansas City, Mo., but I happen to be from Missouri. I hold no brief for E. Mont Reily, the present Governor of Porto Rico. I have not had anything to say in the controversy which the gentleman has raised, because after reading what the gentleman said before concerning Governor Reily it occurred to me that all the complaints or charges that he makes against him relate to matters that are supposed to have occurred before his appointment and that might properly address themselves to the President, and no doubt did, and were considered by the President at the time of Governor Reily's appointment. Inasmuch as I had nothing to do with his appointment, and the appointment was a personal one by the President, I have not felt called upon to say anything in regard to the matter that the gentleman has heretofore presented and is now presenting to the House.

Mr. DAVILA. I am sorry to see that the gentleman from Missouri has not read my speech very carefully, unless he thinks that the charges I have made against Governor Reily are not enough for the removal of the governor. If he has reached that conclusion I have nothing to say to the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, it is with deep regret that I arise again in this House to discuss the affairs of Porto Rico under the administration of E. Mont Reily. I am compelled to do so, however, not only in defense of my own good name but also in defense of an unwarranted and unjustified attack upon my people. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], a close personal friend of Governor Reily, has very warmly taken the defense of his good friend, the indefensible Mont Reily, and attempted to present my people and myself as disloyal to the American Nation. I will prove that the gentleman is acting under an erroneous impression and that his personal friend, E. Mont Reily, has assigned him a very difficult and embarrassing rôle.

Beginning with the ridiculous charges growing out of the $5,000 appropriated by the legislature, the governor says, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] joins him in his assertion:

First. That the turning down of the payment of the appropriation is the cause of the hatred of the Resident Commissioner for the governor.

Second. That while I have stated that I declined to accept the appropriation and that the matter was brought to the attention of the auditor without my knowledge, yet it is a fact that I commissioned Mr. Barceló to secure in my name the payment of said appropriation.

The first charge is the only one which might connect me with the governor in this affair.

It is admitted that the governor did not know of the appropriation until his arrival in Porto Rico. At his request Judge Bonner submitted to him a statement, from which I quote the following:

On Saturday, July 30, 1921, on which date Governor Reily arrived in Porto Rico, accompanied by Hon. CORDOVA DAVILA, Resident Commissioner, I was informed by the commissioner that he wished to see me at my office. I cordially invited him to come whenever he found it convenient, but he did not do so. I submitted on the next Monday morning the whole matter of said appropriation to Governor Reily, and was informed by him that he agreed with my conclusions; that in his opinion no warrant should be issued covering the appropriation to the commissioner, and he further ordered that I should not set it up on the books of my office, inasmuch as he considered I had obeyed the law throughout the entire transaction.

I confess that I can not understand what the auditor means when he goes out of his way to say in connection with this matter that on my arrival in the island I told him that I wished to see him. I remember that when Judge Bonner arrived at the pier to meet the governor I introduced him to the new executive as a very efficient and honest man. I did that with a purpose; and it is very easy to explain my commendation of the auditor as well as my words when I said that I desired to talk to him. It is known that Reily while in Washington, and before his first visit to Porto Rico, recommended the removal of the auditor, the attorney general, and the commissioner of education of the island and that I opposed these removals. Notwithstanding this, Reily insisted on the removal of the auditor, Judge Bonner, to appoint in his place his friend from Kansas City, Mo., Mr. Kessinger. As I considered it a mistake to remove without cause an efficient officer, I felt it my duty to warn Judge Bonner about the intentions of the governor.

I never had any knowledge of the conversation between the auditor and the governor about the appropriation. Their private interview was entirely unknown to me. Admitting that the governor expressed his approval to the ruling of Judge Bonner, as I was not aware of this fact, I could not feel any personal animosity toward him for such a reason. And even assuming that E. Mont Reily acted on this matter and that his attitude was known to me, how can it be possible that I should feel personal animosity against him for this when I never had any animosity against the auditor who ruled that the appropriation was invalid? How can the governor reconcile my alleged interest in securing the payment of this sum when I made all possible efforts to keep in his position the same official who held that the appropriation was invalid and whose resignation was asked by E. Mont Reily?

The following cable which I have received from Judge Bonner in reply to my cabled inquiry shows that I had not any knowledge of the interview between the auditor and the governor and that I never mentioned the appropriation to him:

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 16, 1922.

Hon. CORDOVA DAVILA,
Washington, D. C.:

You never personally presented matter of appropriation to me orally or in writing, nor did you request me to submit matter to Governor Reily. Discussed it with other questions with him last August. Several days ago he requested me to state history of case in writing. Statement shows that you asked interview with me but did not come. The appropriation was never mentioned by you to me.

BONNER.

I can not understand why this matter was submitted by the auditor to Governor Reily. According to our organic law the decisions of the auditor shall be final, except that any person aggrieved by his action or decision in the settlement of an account or claim may, within one year, take an appeal in writing to the governor, which appeal shall specifically set forth the particular action of the auditor to which exception is taken. So, the governor has not any jurisdiction in the decisions of the auditor until an appeal is taken in writing. It is a fact that no appeal has ever been taken against the ruling of Judge

Bonner. The auditor acts in a judicial capacity and his decisions can not be controlled by the executive until an appeal is taken. Even assuming that the governor advised the auditor not to authorize the payment of the appropriation, this intervention of the executive is entirely officious because he has nothing to do with a case in which he has not obtained jurisdiction. Judge Bonner is not a man to follow any advice opposed to his own conclusions even if that advice comes from the executive of the island, and should the governor have disapproved his decision I am sure that this disapproval would not have affected him in the least.

The auditor says that he submitted the matter of the appropriation to the governor on August 1, 1921. Eight days after E. Mont Reily was fully informed by the auditor of the whole matter, I received the following letter:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, PORTO RICO,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
San Juan, P. R., August 9, 1921.

Hon. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA,
Resident Commissioner, San Juan, P. R.

MY DEAR JUDGE: You are perhaps aware that there will be a vacancy on the supreme bench of Porto Rico in the next few weeks. I have watched your course in Washington in the past year while you have been representing your people, and I have been greatly impressed with the splendid work you have been trying to accomplish. My attention has been especially attracted to you since my arrival here through your great loyalty to the American flag and people and your glorious patriotism exhibited during the past 10 days. I believe as an American that your loyalty and patriotism should not go unheeded, but should be rewarded. Porto Rico needs more men of your type of unquestioned character, ability, and unselfish leadership known for their sterling worth and patriotism. Since my inaugural your action has been brought so prominently before me I feel it would be better for Porto Rico if you could remain here and help solve the delicate problems before us, for we all need your help, good advice, and counsel.

Therefore I have decided, without consulting you, to recommend to our distinguished President your appointment to fill a vacancy that is to occur on our supreme bench. It would give me much personal pleasure if you would accept this appointment, for I believe your selection would meet with the hearty approval of 90 per cent of the loyal people of Porto Rico, whom you have served so faithfully and well.

Please give me an immediate reply.

Yours faithfully,

E. MONT REILY, Governor.

And this Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico who has been assailed by the governor as capable of entertaining personal feelings against him for his supposed intervention in the matter of the $5,000 is the same man who declined to accept a position for life on the supreme bench of Porto Rico.

The governor was so impressed by Judge Bonner's report that he immediately offered to the Resident Commissioner a life position on the supreme court bench, and at the same time asked for the auditor's resignation.

It is evident that I have proven beyond any doubt that the statement of the governor attributing to me personal animosity toward him on account of his alleged intervention in the matter of the appropriation is entirely unwarranted.

Regarding the second charge that I commissioned Mr. Barceló to secure in my name the payment of the allowance, I quote from a statement published by Mr. Barceló in the public press of the island, which is self-explanatory. It says:

I must explain, however, that, although I acted in Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA'S name in claiming payment of said account, I did so to maintain the claim as a matter of principle and notwithstanding the protests at all times made by Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA, that while he was Resident Commissioner he would never accept the appropriation.

It is also well to state that the last verbal statement which the auditor says was made to him in the matter and to which he replied by the letter published in El Tiempo, was not made by me nor in the name of Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA, but by the senate committee on finance and appropriations at the time said committee had the appropriation under consideration during the last legislature. It is a pity that we should have to lose time destroying such petty intrigue.

I also want to read a letter written by a prominent lawyer of Porto Rico who was assistant attorney general and later judge of the district court of San Juan. The veracity and integrity of this gentleman is well recognized in the island of Porto Rico:

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 8, 1922.

Mr. ANTONIO R. BARCELÓ,
San Juan, P. R.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Because of existing political controversies some one has been seeking to disparage the conduct of the Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico in Washington, Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA, regarding the $5,000 voted by the legislature with the approval of the former governor.

It has perhaps escaped your memory that I intervened in this question as a lawyer and at your request, and the reason for this letter is because I wish to clarify the matter by my knowledge of the case.

Immediately after the auditor of Porto Rico had denied payment of this appropriation you asked me to give you my opinion as to whether you could appeal to the governor with a probability of succeeding. I studied the matter and reached the conclusion, which I transmitted to you, that the Federal statutes and precedents cited by the auditor in support of his decision were not applicable to the rights of the Legislature of Porto Rico, and that an appeal from them to the governor should be made.

I also had the honor of informing you that in accordance with article 21 of the organic act, only Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA himself had the right to make such an appeal, he being the injured party, and in reply to this I remember perfectly that you said to me that if such was the case nothing could be done about it, because Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA did not wish under any circumstance to accept this appropriation, but that you had been acting on your own account with the desire that a definite decision in this matter be rendered once and for all.

All this occurred a long time before the arrival of the present Governor of Porto Rico.

Yours very truly,

R. RIVERA ZAYAS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is true that my friends in the island insistently advised me to accept the appropriation, and it is my impression that Mr. Barceló used my name, among other reasons, because he wanted to present the claim in a legal and proper way. I am not prepared to say whether the appropriation is valid or not, for I have not given careful consideration to this matter and have not studied the legal aspects of it. But I know that prominent lawyers in the island maintain the validity of the appropriation, alleging that if the matter is brought to the consideration of a court of competent jurisdiction the action of the legislature will be upheld. Let me say that there is nothing improper or immoral in the approval of this appropriation by the legislature. The island of Porto Rico does not spend a cent in her representation in Washington, while other insular possessions annually appropriate funds to be expended here for the benefit of the people and under the supervision of their representatives.

Porto Rico has only one Representative in Washington, and if the Resident Commissioner uses any appropriation allowed to him for the benefit of the people, rendering a proper account, I do not see anything in such a course which may be subjected to criticism. The Legislature of Porto Rico has acted openly in this matter, and has included the appropriation in a public law. There is nothing that our legislators desire to conceal, and the publicity given to the matter in the statutes of Porto Rico is the best proof of the honesty of their intentions. I want to state, however, that I will never accept such appropriation.

The gentleman from Kansas seems to be particularly interested in the cablegrams which I sent to Mr. Barceló and which were printed by him in the RECORD. In the first of these cablegrams I urged the Senate of Porto Rico to adopt a resolution making specific charges against the governor. I sent this cablegram to have them perfect the pleadings, as it were, when my people urged me to bring the matter before Congress, because I wanted the charges to be specific and not in general terms, and because it was natural to ask and receive the cooperation of the people in the same way that I was cooperating with them in their demand for an investigation. I merely asked the senate to ratify the charges which were made by the majority caucus of the legislature three months ago and which were sent to the President of the United States.

And the gentleman from Kansas, who declined to yield to the Resident Commissioner, after assailing his character, notwithstanding repeated interrogations addressed to him, asked this arrogant and sensational question, "Does the gentleman from Porto Rico deny sending this cablegram?" Of course, I sent it. Is there anything wrong in requesting from my people their cooperation in the investigation they were pressing me to ask from Congress?

The last part of the cablegram was sent in the name of Mr. Walter McK. Jones, a member of the Porto Rican Commission, because I did not agree with the conclusion reached by him. This disagreement was noticed by Mr. Barceló, who cabled me to consult Judge TOWNER and Congressman CAMPBELL of Kansas. I consulted with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas and he told me he did not want to interfere in our troubles with Reily; but that, in his opinion, it should be better for the Senate to act on the merits of the appointments and not to pass the resolution. I told him that my people were pressing me to ask for a congressional investigation, and that in my opinion I had not any other course to follow. He replied without approving my attitude and rather regretting it, that if I had made up my mind I could act on my own responsibility. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] asked if I sent this cable to Porto Rico. Certainly I did. Is there any improper conduct in consulting with two prominent Members of Congress?

But the gentleman from Kansas seems to have lost his self-control and self-respect when he asked these vicious and foolish questions:

Does the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, deny that he recently cabled Senator Barceló in Porto Rico for money to carry on the fight here against the governor, and will he explain to this House and the country as to whether or not Mr. Barceló in complying with his request, and before he made his speech in Congress, cabled him $600 to the Dupont Bank in Washington, and said in his cable he would send more soon? Will the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, give the date of this transaction and explain to the country as to whether or not that had any influence upon his attack upon the Governor of Porto Rico? Will the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, also explain as to whether or not a cablegram sent by him on February 17, 1922, of which the following is an extract copy—

FEBRUARY 17, 1922.

BARCELÓ, San Juan:

Your cable pleases me very much. Plans actively under way for action in Congress. I will make speech at earliest opportunity, followed by a resolution which will probably be introduced by a Republican.

CORDOVA DAVILA.

is an acknowledgment of the receipt of the $600 or in connection with it?

Does the gentleman mean to insinuate that Mr. Barceló has bought me for $600 to make a speech against the governor? This malicious and gratuitous innuendo, this perfidious insinuation of the gentleman from Kansas, needs not any refutation by me. Let it stand in the RECORD as it was printed and as the most serious reflection upon him. If the gentleman from Kansas really desires information regarding communications with my constituents, which he can not obtain from the cable messages secured in an underhand method, I will enlighten him by saying that Mr. Barceló, who was chairman of the commission named by the people of Porto Rico to come to Washington for the purpose of demanding the recall of Governor Reily, did cable me $600 on February 16, and that this money was used to pay legitimate expenses incurred by the Porto Rican Commission, which is still represented in Washington by Mr. W. McK. Jones, a member of the Porto Rican Legislature. These expenses included stenographer, printing, telephone and telegraph charges, and other legitimate and proper expenses, and have or will be paid by voluntary contributions from the people of Porto Rico who sent the commission to Washington and not from the public treasury of the island. I will even go further and say that if my explanation does not satisfy the curiosity of the gentleman from Kansas, I will be glad to give him a detailed account of how the $600 was expended if he will call at my office.

The cablegram from Mr. Barceló, which the gentleman from Kansas so well knows, although it was written in Spanish, contained 67 words, 60 dealing with the Reily affair and 7 announcing the sending of funds. In this cable, which did please me very much, Mr. Barceló says that they will not surrender their rights for any promise or concession on the part of the governor.

And now that the gentleman from Kansas displays such great interest in knowing how our private money has been spent, can he tell me who paid the expenses of three of the gentlemen who accompanied the governor from Porto Rico to Washington to campaign in his behalf? Can the gentleman explain whether or not the public money of Porto Rico has been used to defray the expenses of the governor's party? And can the gentleman explain if there is any law in Porto Rico which authorizes the governor to spend the public money of the island to defray expenses of this nature? These are very pertinent questions which I would like the gentleman to answer. His inquiries about the expenditures of our private funds suggest that he will have a greater interest in knowing the way in which the public funds of Porto Rico are used by the governor.

The gentleman appears to be very well informed about the cables sent by Mr. Barceló to the Resident Commissioner. How did the gentleman get this information? I know that the president of the senate can not send an official message to Washington without the governor passing upon the same, as the governor has the control of the cables. I had indications that Reily was violating our private correspondence, but I could not give credit to this report. The information printed by the gentleman from Kansas regarding the cable sent by Mr. Barceló has been a great surprise to me. It is my opinion that this matter ought to be investigated. When I was in Porto Rico I could not send an official message to Washington because the cable companies alleged that they were forbidden by Reily to transmit my cables. The governor said that he had not given such an order, but the fact is that I could not use the cables officially, and that the only reason given by the companies to justify their refusal was that they have to obey the orders of the governor.

I have reason to believe that the gentleman from Kansas did not obtain the information contained in these messages from the Committee on Accounts and it is my purpose to investigate this matter until I get all the facts.

I really feel indignant when I see that the sanctity of my correspondence has been violated by the officious magpie that sits in San Juan to indulge his curiosity by prying into the communications of other people through backstairs and gutter practices. This side light of the type of creature that has been sent there as governor bears out his sinister record in the Post Office Department, wherein it is charged that—

In 1904 he was investigated and recommended for removal for having made false affidavits and for having caused certain scurrilous articles to be published in the public press about certain prominent citizens in Kansas City, Mo.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that this matter demands an immediate investigation.

In another of the cables printed by the gentleman from Kansas I advised my friends not to surrender their rights under any circumstances, and the reason of my advice is very plain. I did not want my people to surrender their rights for any concession in the distribution of public offices. We are fighting for a sacred cause and not for public jobs. What we want is a decent and able man as the representative of the United States in the island. I know that E. Mont Reily is unfit to govern a people, that his reputation and character are entirely discredited, that his veracity and integrity can be successfully impeached, and there is no power in the world that can compel me to accept a man of his character and caliber as governor of my island.

In the last cable printed in the RECORD by the gentleman from Kansas I say:

Everything here favorable. Press helping us.

And that is true, gentlemen. Congress may not accord the investigation asked for by me, the President of the United States may keep Reily in Porto Rico, but the good people of this Nation, the disciples of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln are with us in our fight, and I am sure that our appeal to the American people will not be in vain.

In keeping with the brazen misrepresentation that has characterized Reily ever since he has been in Porto Rico is the ridiculous story of the flags that he has given to the Representative from Kansas to be retailed on the floor of this House. The gentleman solemnly stated that—for four years prior to Governor Reily going to Porto Rico as its governor but 1,600 flags were sold in Porto Rico, while in the half year that he has been governor over 13,000 American flags have been purchased.

I want to say in all frankness that this is the first I ever heard of this. I do not deny it, because I know nothing about it; but I am equally frank when I say I do not believe a word of it. How does the governor know how many flags were sold among the 1,300,000 people living in Porto Rico during the four years prior to his coming there? I wonder if a census or record is kept of such sales or if it is simply a brazen assertion of facts when he deals in these numbers.

In the course of his harangue, which was principally notable for the mass of inaccuracies and misinformation which it contained, the gentleman from Kansas told of the parade of the Unionist Party through the streets of San Juan, following its triumph in the last election. He said there were—thousands of its followers in line, each carrying the one-star flag. Not an American flag! A number of Porto Rican soldiers of the Regular Army who took part were court-martialed and relieved of their duty for several months.

Mr. Chairman, I participated in that parade. My carriage was decorated with a flag and only one flag, my national flag—the Stars and Stripes. So the gentleman is beside the facts when he says there was not an American flag in line. In fact, there were many American flags in that procession, and the local Porto Rican flag was to be found in profusion. The man in charge of the decorations and the parade, Mr. José Ruiz Soler, is one of the best-known citizens of Porto Rico, a former American soldier, who as color sergeant of the detachment that came to Washington to attend the second inaugural of President McKinley received the personal commendation of the martyred President. Mr. Soler is affiliated with the National Republican Party of the continental United States and a member of the Unionist Party in Porto Rico. His loyalty and republicanism can be personally vouched for by such a stanch party leader as Senator WATSON of Indiana, and it is unthinkable that this man would have engaged in the designs intimated by the gentleman from Kansas.

That his remarks about the Porto Rican troops are no more accurate than his statement concerning the flag is proven by the following communication from the commander of the forces in Porto Rico addressed to the editor of the San Juan Times, the recognized Reily organ in the island, under date of January 13, 1922:

COLONEL JARVIS CRITICIZES THE TIMES.

POST OF SAN JUAN, P. R.,
San Juan, P. R., January 13, 1922.

To the EDITOR OF THE TIMES:

I have just read an article in your issue of January 12, 1922, headed "Former Governor Post's article."

It has not been my policy to mix in the political squabbles and differences in the island with which the papers have been filled nor to cavil at the frequent inaccuracies, more or less unimportant, in referring to occurrences among the troops or to military activities.

All the papers in the city have been notified that information would be furnished, if desired, about any matters of interest concerning the troops that it is proper to publish and the request made of all of them that items be verified at headquarters before publication. If, however, any paper does not care to avail itself of the opportunity and publishes misleading news it merely reflects on the paper and possibly inconveniences some of its readers. I have not considered it of sufficient importance to offer correction, and I have no intention now of changing my policy in that respect. It is the privilege of a newspaper to gather news where it finds it, but I believe it is a duty also to ascertain the truth, and this is even more important as to assertions appearing in the editorial columns. In the article in question, however, your reference to the regiment is so prominently placed, so unequivocally stated, and the charge made is so serious that I feel that I can not ignore it. I have no intention to comment on other matters touched on in the article, and if I do so it is only incidental. I find it difficult to make a specific answer, as the charge is so general and sweeping, but a general denial is not an answer. The only incident referred to in such a way that it can be identified is not correctly stated. No question of disloyalty came to my attention. It is true that orders were issued in accordance with the instructions and long-established policy of the War Department, prohibiting all in the military service from engaging in political activities. For violation of such orders a noncommissioned officer was reduced. He was not a color sergeant. The action would have been the same whether his activity had been in favor of one or another party. I also early in the campaign reproved one young officer for unauthorized political activity. It just happens that these two men belonged to different political parties. No other instances of undue political activity came to my notice. Of course, men in the military service have political opinions, and many of the officers and enlisted men exercised their political rights according to their party affiliations, but it is safe to say that nowhere in Porto Rico was there less offensive partisanship than among them. It is my business to know of influences that may affect the loyalty and dependability of officers and men under my command, and I speak whereof I know when I say that no more loyal, patriotic troops exist than are found right here in Porto Rico. No reason to doubt the loyalty of any man has come to my attention, but, on the contrary, daily and unmistakable evidence of reverence for the flag, loyalty to country, and devotion to duty is evident.

Each officer and enlisted man takes the oath "to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all its enemies whomsoever," and, make no mistake, the Porto Rican troops can be depended upon in any emergency to fulfill their obligation to the last letter.

A charge affecting his loyalty is the most serious that can be made against the character of a man in the military service. No disloyal man should be permitted to remain in the service. No such man under my command would be at liberty for a minute longer than it took to get him to the guardhouse. I therefore feel it my duty to call upon you for the evidence in support of your charge of disloyalty, or that you make full, complete, and public retraction of your derogatory remarks.

Yours truly,

M. S. JARVIS,
Colonel Sixty-fifth Infantry.

The gentleman from Kansas says that he was present at a banquet given in Porto Rico when the president of the senate, Mr. Barceló, in his address openly advocated the separation of the island from the United States, and that he was amazed because the banquet was presided over by the then governor of the island. I have not the speech of Mr. Barceló here, but if I get a copy of it I will gladly insert it in the RECORD, if permitted to do so by the House. Mr. Barceló denies this charge, stating that probably the gentleman from Kansas misinterpreted his words. Regarding the Governor of Porto Rico at that time, Hon. Arthur Yager, in justice to him I want to say that there is not a more patriotic and devoted American than he. His honesty and spirit of justice were recognized even by his enemies, and his record as a private citizen and as a public servant is the best evidence of his devotion to duty and loyalty to the flag.

The gentleman from Kansas says that Mr. Barceló and myself are controlling the public affairs of Porto Rico for our own benefit. This is the first time that I have heard this accusation against me. Let me say to the gentleman that I have not any intervention in the administration of the internal affairs of the island and the filling of public offices by the insular government. This charge has been made by the political enemies of Mr. Barceló with the purpose of weakening his prestige and popularity. As president of the senate and leader of the majority party, Mr. Barceló is naturally in close contact with the public affairs of the island. He will be right or wrong, as a human being, in the political activities of his life, but he is a patriot and not a dictator as has been said by Reily and his friends. His main desire is to see his country happy under a democratic and liberal régime, without any selfish motive and even at the cost of personal sacrifice.

The gentleman from Kansas asked me to—also explain as to who the Mr. Jones is that is described in the cablegram of February 11.

He then proceeds to answer his own question by vouchsafing a mass of misinformation and innuendoes about this gentleman who has attained to a high place in the confidence of the Porto Rican people.

Mr. Jones is a good American who cast his lot with the Porto Rican people and has been a resident of the island for more than 16 years. The gentleman from Kansas, after referring to him in a slurring fashion, states that "as a matter of fact he has no residence there." This assertion is as unreliable, not to use a stronger term, as most of the statements of the gentleman from Kansas. Had he familiarized himself with the organic law of the island, he must have known that Mr. Jones could not be elected as a member of our general assembly unless he was an actual resident of the district he is elected to represent. Not only does he comply with this statutory qualification, but he has been identified with the upbuilding of Porto Rico for almost two decades and is one of our most public-spirited citizens.

A member of our general assembly, he has felt outraged at the type of man who has been sent to Porto Rico as the representative of this Nation and has dedicated his services like other public-spirited Porto Ricans to ridding the island of an administrator whose presence is universally regarded as a blight upon the land. I will say that Mr. W. McK. Jones welcomes the most searching investigation of his activities in this matter and stands ready to assist to the fullest extent any investigating committee that may be named.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] says that I charge that the governor has removed judges who should not have been removed, and points out the reasons given by the executive to explain the dismissal of these officers. Should the gentleman have read my speech I presume that he would not have misrepresented me. I am not prepared to enter into the details of the innocence or guilt of these officers, because no reason has been given for their removal and no investigation has been made. While I do not believe the reasons that according to the gentleman prompted the governor to execute these illegal acts, I charge that these officers were removed without giving them an opportunity to be heard. The executive has no power to pass upon the innocence or guilt of a judge without a proper investigation as provided by law. The executive can only remove judicial officers for cause shown, which means a hearing and an investigation, according to the Porto Rican statutes, and it is a matter of record that they were removed without cause shown. The charge that one of the judges failed to docket 740 cases involving his unionist friends is unbelievable, and I dare say that this statement is not correct. All these charges made by the gentleman from Kansas on the information of the governor are demanding an investigation. The law presumes that every man is innocent until his culpability is established, and the judicial officers removed without investigation have in their favor the presumption of innocence.

The gentleman from Kansas informed you that Governor Reily has "protected the treasury and the taxpayers of Porto Rico" by refusing to approve an issue of bonds of $14,250,000 authorized by the last session of the Porto Rican Legislature. The legislature, according to the gentleman from Kansas, had "appropriated $1,800,000 over and above the tax income." He stated that the governor "refused to permit the issuance of these bonds for the reason that it would have financially wrecked the island, which is now already bonded for $15,000,000."

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts in this connection? The president of the Porto Rican Senate has cabled me a full explanation of the charge made by the gentleman from Kansas. I will read:

The statement of Congressman STRONG, based on information provided by Reily, only proves the ignorance of the governor in accepting advice from the auditor which has been used to deceive Mr. STRONG. The present debt of the insular government is only $11,960,000, as against the insular tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent collected for several years. As a result of this tax surplus there is a redemption trust fund of $1,675,383, which the Treasury has intended to use in redeeming unmatured bonds. The greater part of this debt pertains to irrigation projects in the south of the island and to the improvements of the San Juan Harbor, payable from the receipts of the same. The last insular loans approved by the legislature amounted to only $8,250,000. Loans to the amount of $6,000,000 pertain to municipal loans payable by a special tax levied by each municipality. Such loans affect only the separate margins fixed by the organic act to apply to the municipalities. The last tax levied for the redemption of new loans was only one-fifth of 1 per cent, to be used in addition to the surplus in the existing trust fund of the previous tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent to pay $2,000,000 for the purpose of completing road work already approved by previous legislatures and the appropriations in the laborers' districts. Other loans are made payable by special taxes levied against the beneficiaries of the work provided for in the loans. The Eastern Railroad loan, which is for $3,000,000, is payable from a tax levied with the consent of the landholders of the said region, the law having been subjected to the study and investigation of the public service commission after hearings conducted by the commission to readjust the provisions of the law and to give an opportunity to the public-service enterprises for the construction of connecting lines within one year from the completion of the survey.

The governor's attitude proves his purpose to obstruct the execution of the laws and to create complete confusion of administration and to discredit the country. For this purpose the governor changed the previous heads of the departments, naming others who favored such a disturbing policy. Instead of executing and seeing to the enforcement of the laws enacted by the legislature, the governor's chief mission seems to be to delegate to himself all the powers of the legislative branch of the Government, and deliberately ignoring the provisions of the laws enacted by the legislature. The road improvement work has been abandoned, and the money already expended on these projects will be almost lost. The same thing has happened in connection with the municipal work loans, which have been obstructed the same as the road loans, thus creating an injurious situation affecting not only the progress and credit of the country, but causing misery and need among our laborers, who are unemployed during the crisis and who face an awful situation.

It is not true that the legislature has exceeded its credit margin. Property assessments now exceed $300,000,000, and the margin, according to the organic act, is $30,000,000. As our debt as shown is not $12,000,000, the legislature could easily increase this by $8,250,000, leaving a margin of $9,750,000. I rejoice in an opportunity to show the chaotic situation suffered by the island on account of the acts of Governor Reily. The information contained in this cable has been obtained from the treasury and can be verified by the treasurer.

Now that the gentleman is assailing the Porto Rican Legislature it is proper to say that there is not a legislative body in the world more honest than the Legislature of Porto Rico, that the president of the senate, Mr. Barceló, so frequently mentioned by the gentleman, is a patriot and an honest man, that he has the confidence of the people of Porto Rico, and that his integrity can not be successfully impeached by any man.

Governor Reily does not dare to give you the full truth in the matter of the removal of José Coll y Cuchí. He asserts that I told him that this appointment was made by Mr. Barceló, when as a matter of fact he knows that Mr. Coll y Cuchí was appointed by Acting Governor Benedicto, and he is fully aware of all the details connected with the appointment. The governor failed to state that he was also ready to remove the father of Speaker Coll y Cuchí, Doctor Coll, and it was only through my efforts that his intentions were not carried into effect.

When I was informed of the purpose of the governor I immediately went to see him. He admitted that he had decided to remove Doctor Coll. I remember that on that occasion I said to him:

Governor, you have reminded me of the many congratulations you have received as a result of the removal of Mr. José Coll y Cuchí as chairman of the workmen's relief commission, but if you remove to-day Doctor Coll, who is an able and highly respected man, you will have the universal condemnation of the people, who will think that you are committing an act of revenge and retaliation against the speaker because he is attacking you. After you remove Doctor Coll you will not be able to say that you dismissed Mr. José Coll y Cuchí from office for the good of the service, as your attitude will be construed by everybody as an act of personal animosity against the speaker.

In the face of my strong opposition the governor did not dare to remove Doctor Coll.

E. Mont Reily will not succeed in his efforts to weaken the solid opposition of our party against him. The speaker of the house, who is a brilliant man, is not my personal friend. Mr. Barceló and myself have disagreed on several occasions on matters of principle in the past, but the governor wastes his time when he attempts to sow the seeds of discord and dissention in our ranks, because in this crusade against him we all, friends and enemies, are presenting a united front and will not recede until full justice is done to the people of Porto Rico.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] appears to be very much worried about the Campbell bill granting full self-government to the island of Porto Rico under the American flag, and he attempts to convey the impression that the introduction of this bill has been obtained, through the courtesy of the gentleman from Kansas, Hon. PHILIP P. CAMPBELL, by Mr. Barceló and myself. The gentleman further says that this bill is not the only one which has been introduced for Porto Rico independence.

Let me say to the gentleman that I am compelled to decline the honor of having taken part in the preparation of the Campbell bill, and that the only thing I did was to suggest an amendment after the bill was drafted and the elimination of one of its provisions. My suggestion was not accepted, however, by Mr. CAMPBELL. This is one of the most important bills which has been introduced in the House dealing with our insular possessions. The great domestic issues confronting the American people absorb almost entirely the attention of the Nation, and our difficult problems connected with our possessions are not very seriously considered. The history of the world shows, notwithstanding, that the development of these problems has played a very important part in the vitality and prosperity of nations.

The policy of Spain, placing the government of the overseas possessions in the hands of a few autocrats, caused her the loss of a powerful empire, while England, profiting by the experience of others and her own, has been able to consolidate the Empire in the last 50 years by granting to her colonies a form of government which satisfies the aspirations of the people.

Profiting from the teachings of history, let us work a solution which meets the desires of the people of the distant territories living under the flag and which will affirm the American sovereignty in the hearts of the natives. In my humble opinion this is a matter which deserves the most careful consideration by the statesmen of the Nation. It is not necessary to use the lamp of Diogenes to find these men in America. There is abundant and excellent material and a friendly disposition on the part of the Nation, but there is a lack of interest in the study of these affairs and a great deal of work remains to be done, which, if properly carried into effect, may be a valuable asset to the Nation. It requires sagacity and statesmanship to understand and solve our problems and to meet the requirements of our people in consonance with American principles and American ideals. Sooner or later this matter will come to the consideration of the American people, and it is better to face the situation without delay, to restore confidence in the people, and to clearly define once for all the American policy in the overseas possessions.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] is mistaken when he says that his colleague, the Hon. PHILIP P. CAMPBELL, introduced the bill providing for an associated free state out of courtesy to the commission sent here by the people of Porto Rico. I could have introduced the bill myself without the assistance of any other Member of the House. I know that our friend, Mr. CAMPBELL, is as much interested in the measure as are the people of the island. He is not unmindful of its exceptional importance, and the contribution of the opponents as well as of the friends of the bill will be highly appreciated when the matter comes under the consideration of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

The statement that the Campbell bill provides for the independence of Porto Rico is entirely false, as is the assertion that other bills have been introduced in Congress providing for the independence of the island. I challenge the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] to present the bills referred to by him in his remarks.

The assertion that the Campbell bill will not be seriously considered by Congress may be more or less correct, since the gentleman from Kansas seems to be thoroughly familiar with the sentiments and feelings of Congress in this respect, but I know that the Committee on Insular Affairs will soon grant hearings on this measure, and I have a letter from the President of the United States which leads me to believe that the matter is not so trivial as the gentleman thinks. The letter from the President is the best answer to the assertion that the bill provides for the independence of the island. The President's letter reads:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 18, 1922.

Hon. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CORDOVA: I have to acknowledge yours of February 16 with which you inclosed to me a copy of the cablegram which was addressed to you by President Barceló under date of February 14. I have been very interested to read this message from the leader of the Unionist Party of the Porto Rican Islands. It is very gratifying to have this expression of confidence in the Federal Government of the United States and this manifestation of satisfaction in the association of the islands with the United States and our shared hopes under the American flag. I am assuming that Congress will give its earnest consideration to the bill proposed by Congressman CAMPBELL. I have no doubt that the action taken by the Unionist Party will add to the interest and earnestness of Congress in considering this measure.

Very truly yours,

WARREN G. HARDING.

The gentleman from Kansas has devoted the principal part of his speech to denouncing the Unionist Party and the sentiment for independence in the island as a serious menace to the United States.

This sentiment for independence is very old in Porto Rico. It dates back to the time of the Spanish régime. Spain alienated the affection of the insular people by her autocratic and despotic methods and because of the policy followed by the Spanish Conservative Party. The Porto Ricans were accused by the ruling class of being disloyal and traitors to the Spanish nation. The greatest enemies of Spain in Porto Rico were the Spaniards. They kept absolute control of the public affairs of the island and were opposed to any concession in the nature of self-government because they thought that every right granted to the native was a privilege lost by them. When the American soldiers arrived in the island they were acclaimed by the people as liberators and not as conquerors, as the gentleman from Kansas intimates, and the Porto Rican flag, now insulted by Governor Reily, was pinned on the coats of many of these American soldiers. The cordial reception given to them by the people made almost unnecessary the shedding of blood, and the American Nation took possession of the island without the sacrifices of life inherent to every war. As the people were disgusted under the Spanish rulers they accorded a cordial welcome to the soldiers of the land of freedom and democracy, notwithstanding that at that time a liberal form of government had been granted to the island by Spain. Let me quote from a proclamation of the commander in chief of the American forces, Gen. Nelson A. Miles, on his arrival in Porto Rico on the 25th of July, 1898:

In the prosecution of the war against the Kingdom of Spain by the people of the United States in the cause of liberty, justice, and humanity its military forces have come to occupy the island of Porto Rico. They come bearing the banner of freedom, inspired by a noble purpose, to seek the enemies of our country and yours and to destroy or capture all who are in armed resistance. They bring you the fostering arms of a nation of free people, whose greatest power is in its justice and humanity to all those living within its fold.

Compare this proclamation, issued at the beginning of America's occupation, with the inaugural address of Governor Reily nearly a quarter of a century later. Surely, we are making progress!

It would be a mistake to use in the twentieth century after 24 years of American administration the old and discredited methods of the past. The people of the United States can not afford to adopt a policy which cost Spain her overseas possessions and destroyed the greatness of the Spanish Empire. There may be two or three gentlemen who, like Governor Reily, think that it is a good policy to use a club to suppress the sentiment for independence. They are mistaken. It is by persuasion and not by force that we may win the hearts of the people. You can stop an idea with another idea, but never with a club. Let us base our plea for Americanism on the force of American institutions and American ideals and let us infuse in the soul of the people confidence in justice through persuasion, arguments, and love. The only conquests of the world which have been enduring and everlasting in the hearts of the people are those obtained by love. There have been many Cæsars, but only one Christ, and while the autocratic governments of these early emperors have passed away the teachings of Christ still survive and the Christian doctrines are spread all over the world.

There is an element in the island who honestly and sincerely believe that independence is the only solution of our problems. It is our opinion that they are mistaken, and it is much better to persuade them of their errors than to charge them with disloyalty and treason. I firmly believe in the happiness of Porto Rico under the American flag, and I hope to see all my people, without exception, enjoying the benefit of our institutions in a permanent and indestructible union with our brothers of the mainland. It may be safely said that the Star Spangled Banner will wave forever on our public buildings, because it is the will of America and the forces of the Nation are behind the flag, but it will be more glorious to say that the American flag will never come down in Porto Rico because the Porto Ricans will not consent to that.

Governor Reily has on a number of occasions said that there are no more than 200 Porto Ricans who are advocating independence. Personally, I believe that the governor has perhaps underestimated the number. As I have already said, I believe, and the same sentiment is reflected by a majority of the people, that these well-meaning people are mistaken. When it comes to fixing the permanent political status of the island, the Congress of the United States will find that the people of Porto Rico will be perfectly contented to accept an autonomous government under the American flag.

It is my opinion, however, that the sentiment for complete independence will increase so long as E. Mont Reily is permitted to continue as governor of the island.

The strongest argument in favor of independence in Porto Rico to-day is E. Mont Reily. The greatest obstacle to the advancement of Americanism in the island to-day is E. Mont Reily. The advocates of independence are appealing for new recruits to their cause every day by pointing to E. Mont Reily as a symbol of Americanism. Do you expect to continue to hold the loyalty and respect of the people of Porto Rico when you send to the island as governor an irresponsible despot, who wraps himself within the folds of the Star Spangled Banner and then attempts to rule our people after the fashion of a Roman proconsul? The people of Porto Rico honor and respect the American flag, which is our flag as well as your flag. But I say to you in all seriousness, gentlemen, that the Stars and Stripes is being desecrated when it is made to serve as a shield to protect the conduct of a bully who wantonly insults our people and then seeks refuge beneath the folds of our sacred national emblem.

The charge of disloyalty against the Unionist Party is entirely unjustified. We have proven our loyalty not only by words of mouth but by plain and undeniable deeds during the crisis of the last war, when the patriotism of the citizens was subjected to a supreme test. It is very easy to speak about loyalty under the blessings of peace. It is not so easy to prove loyalty under the harass of war. The record of my island during the crisis speaks for itself and is second to none. No State of the Union can exhibit a better record than ours.

A prominent American writer, Mr. Henry A. Wise Wood, who visited the island in 1918, describing the activities of Porto Rico during the war in an article published in the New York Herald, said:

MAKING AMERICANS.

On March 2, 1917, American citizenship was conferred upon the Porto Rican. For nearly two decades he had had a land but no country. For 19 years he had been knocking at our door, unable to enter or go elsewhere. The flag over his head was not his flag, nor could he raise one of his own. So only two months before our declaration of war the Porto Rican was not an American citizen. Would he, therefore, be willing to fight for our cause?

It was this query, possibly, that caused the War Department to hesitate when announcing the draft to apply it to Porto Rico. But this hesitation, whatever its cause, had a galvanic effect upon the people of the island. Instantly there arose an indignant protest and a demand that Porto Rico be permitted to supply its full quota to the Army whose flag at last was its flag. Not only would it fight, but the opportunity to do so it demanded as its right. The children of Columbus's conquistadors were willing and ready to support the liberties of the New World, the world that he and their ancestors had carved out with their swords.

Already had the Unionist Party sent a cable to the President of the United States announcing its support of the war, with the demand that "Porto Rico be assigned its full quota of sacrifice and suffering to obtain victory."

But how did the individual Porto Rican react? A month after the declaration of war the Porto Rico Regiment of the United States Army was ordered to recruit its full strength and prepare for active duty. In three days it had enlisted 654 men and so had filled its ranks; in two weeks, drilled and fully uniformed, the regiment was on its way. Again, when Col. Roosevelt's volunteers were being recruited, it is said, 1,700 selected men signed up in seven days.

On August 27 an officers' training camp was opened at Cayay, amid the tobacco fields in the center of the island, with 250 Porto Ricans, 95 per cent of whom were graduates of colleges or universities in the United States. So thoroughly was the work done in this camp that on November 26, 88 per cent of these men were commissioned.

The results of this experiment caused great popular enthusiasm, and another camp, within the Morro Fortress, was opened with 400 men on February 1, 1918, and was hard at work when I visited it. One of its companies is wholly composed of negroes, so that officers of the lower ranks shall be provided for the negro regiments which are to be drawn from the island. Here also is being trained the home guard of San Juan, of 1,500 men, among them the foremost judges and professional and business men of the place, as well as 500 Boy Scouts.

Porto Rico has caught the war fever, and is glad of it—which is the more remarkable because its people are so little warlike that, although in the revolution belt, it has never known a revolt.

I had not pushed my inquiries far before it became plain that behind this enthusiasm for the war and ardent wish to serve in it was the stimulating influence of one man, an American Army officer. To such an astonishing extent does this soldier seem to have won the affections and confidence of these people that they have not only unquestionably put themselves into his hands in matters relating to the war but have requested the President to make him a brigadier general, so that the Porto Rican troops when they go to the front shall be commanded by him.

EAGER TO HONOR HIM.

A sheaf of these requests has fallen into my hands, from free translations of some of which I select the following excerpts:

The resolution of the House of Representatives of Porto Rico recites that "for some years there has lived among us a noble and generous son of America, directing with great foresight and commendable zeal the honorable and high duty of chief of the American troops in Porto Rico, whose name is well known by all—Orval P. Townshend"; that "Colonel Townshend has gained the love and gratitude of this island of Porto Rico by his open and decided efforts for the welfare and prestige of our land, honoring it by an efficient propaganda useful to the good name of Porto Ricans"; that "Orval P. Townshend, as colonel of the Porto Rican troops, has recently successfully carried through an intensive and arduous task to satisfy the wishes of the mothers of the future soldiers who are to give up their lives for the liberty of the world and for the triumph of justice and the rights of humanity, to satisfy those unselfish women who asked that the cantonment for the military instruction of their sons be established in Porto Rico, for the instruction of the sons whose lives they themselves offered with noble patriotism for the defense of the cause upheld by the noble American people"; that "the people of Porto Rico realize the efforts of Colonel Townshend to do full justice to Porto Ricans, and consider him one of their valuable champions"; and that, therefore, it is "resolved by this house of representatives, first, to make a matter of record a vote of thanks and gratitude to Col. Orval P. Townshend for his well-guided purpose in the performance of his official duties; second, that the Government be requested by cable, as a special favor, that Lieut. Col. Orval P. Townshend be promoted to the rank of brigadier general."

The majority of the soldiers were affiliated with the Unionist Party. The administration of the island was Unionist, and the patriotic spirit of our men deserved the highest commendation.

This patriotic attitude of the people of Porto Rico prompted the commander of the Porto Rican forces, General Townshend, to say that had not the draft applied to Porto Rico he was sure he could fill the quota of the island by simply calling for volunteers.

The best proof that can be shown of the patriotic sentiments of Porto Rico are set forth in the following letter from General Crowder to Major Wilson, the adjutant general of the island:

MY DEAR MAJOR WILSON: I have just received from Lieutenant Colonel Kramer a personal letter filled with a glowing description of the achievements of the selective draft in Porto Rico. His account of the accomplishments of the island has not added to my admiration of the work that has been done there, as I already knew from less direct information of the splendid efforts that had been exerted. But it prompts me at this particular time to express to you, and through you to Governor Yeager, Captain Van Deusen, and the other gentleman who so ably directed the administration of the selective service law, an appreciation of the work which is now drawing to a close.

I noted with pleasure in Colonel Kramer's letter that the percentage of delinquents and deserters on the island is probably lower than in any other administrative subdivision. This is indeed a tribute not only to the loyalty and patriotism of your registrants, but also to the splendid spirit which you have infused into the administration of the selective draft. This remarkable spirit of cooperation is further emphasized by the fact that no member of the 76 local boards has charged the Government for his services.

As you see, we had no slackers in our country. Our local registration boards refused to receive any compensation for their work, and with this wonderful record we appeal to the American Congress, asking only justice for the people of Porto Rico.

The Unionist Party in convention assembled pledged its unconditional support to the American Nation. I was present at the convention, gentlemen, and I can not describe with words the patriotic enthusiasm of the people on that occasion. The resolution was adopted among the applauses of the members, and immediately the president of the senate, Mr. Barceló, sent to President Wilson the following cable:

SAN JUAN, P. R., May 9, 1917.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
Washington, D. C.:

The Unionist Party of Porto Rico, gathered in an assembly at San Juan, pledges its unconditional support to the American Nation and to its illustrious President in the present conflict, and expects that Porto Rico be assigned its share of sufferings and sacrifices until victory is obtained.

And while the Unionist Party, assailed as disloyal by Governor Reily and the gentleman from Kansas, was pledging its support to the Nation, the President of the Porto Rican Republican Party, which is an entirely different organization from the great American party, whose name it has appropriated, now supported by the governor, was being quoted in the San Juan Times as saying:

If our countryman (Jíbaro) goes to France, he does so not through his own volition, but because he is sent by law and by the national will.

It has been said that when Mr. Bryan visited Porto Rico he was so impressed with the anti-Americanism in the island that he was compelled to remind the people that he was, first, an American. I am going to prove with Mr. Bryan himself that the remarks attributed to him are entirely untrue. I quote from a statement made by Hon. William J. Bryan before the Committee on Insular Affairs on April 19, 1910, immediately after his return from Porto Rico:

I appeal to you gentlemen in dealing with these people of Porto Rico to remember that they are with us; that they are a part of us; and that their destiny is interwoven with our destiny. They welcomed us when we went there. For 12 years they have been loyal supporters. There has not been a suggestion of opposition to our country, and you will not find there to-day hostility to America or American institutions. Our language is spreading there and spreading rapidly. The children are taking it up and taking it up gladly. Those people are anxious to be one with us, and I think that we will find it to our interest in every way to make them feel that they are at home and that they are in their father's house.

* * * * * * *

I confess that the little visit I made to Porto Rico has made me even more friendly to that little island than I was before I went there. I confess that my acquaintance with those people convinced me, if I needed to be convinced, that they are loyal to the United States and loyal to our institutions, and that with their every motive—their motives of generosity, their motives of justice, and their motives of selfish pecuniary interest—we can afford to take them by the hand, assure them that we are friends, and ask them to walk with us in the path our Nation has pointed out and to be our rivals only to see which can the most contribute to the good of this which is now our common country. [Applause.]

I warn the Members of Congress and the American people about the character of information coming from Porto Rico in support of Reily. This propaganda has been initiated and is carried out by Reily himself, who has converted his office into a political club. They write letters, messages, and articles full of misinformation and insult. The articles printed in the RECORD by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], referring to the welcome accorded Governor Reily on his return to the island, are inspired by the executive's club. The Times of San Juan is to-day the paper of Governor Reily. Everybody knows that a number of articles published in that newspaper have been inspired by the governor himself. He is importing in Porto Rico the same policy of defamation which gave him a pitiful notoriety in Kansas City, Mo.

Mr. Chairman, some days ago on the floor of this House I charged E. Mont Reily as being morally and mentally unfit to govern the island of Porto Rico. I submitted for your consideration specific charges and requested a congressional investigation to establish the governor's guilt or innocence. Has Governor Reily denied the charges? Has Governor Reily come forward and demanded an exoneration at the hands of Congress? No, gentlemen, the governor has not denied the charges and he has not joined in the request for an investigation.

The gentleman from Kansas says that the friends of Governor Reily will welcome an investigation in connection with the management of the public affairs of Porto Rico by the leaders of the Unionist Party, but the governor himself has not said a word. I will welcome a full and complete investigation in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Kansas, the Unionist Party will welcome such an investigation, the people of Porto Rico are clamoring for it, and in justice both to Governor Reily and our people an investigation should be ordered. I therefore challenge the gentleman from Kansas, who appeared on the floor of this House as the authorized spokesman of Governor Reily, to introduce a resolution calling for a congressional investigation of the facts in connection with the so-called attempt of the gentleman from Porto Rico to secure payment of the $5,000, with all the activities of the Unionist Party, the legislative work of our general assembly, and the official acts of E. Mont Reily as governor of the island.

Let the gentleman from Kansas introduce a resolution or let him by his failure to do so admit that Governor Reily is not willing to face an investigation.

I have been authorized by the president of our senate and the speaker of the house to accept and demand the investigation proposed by the gentleman from Kansas, including all the suggestions made by the friends of the governor or by the governor himself.

It is a very poor defense of E. Mont Reily to attempt to exonerate him by launching a personal attack against the men who are protesting against his administration. Suppose, gentlemen, that I appear as an attorney before a court of justice to defend a man charged with the commission of a crime, and suppose that instead of defending the accused I start a personal attack against the attorney for the State. The judge will laugh, the State attorney will laugh, the jury will laugh at me, and after I finish my remarks a verdict of guilty will be the natural result of my unsuccessful task.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] may prepare and deliver a number of speeches on the floor of this House insulting our people and praising Governor Reily, but he will not convince me or anybody else of the innocence of the governor until he is fully exonerated after a proper and impartial investigation. I will say to the gentleman that if after an investigation it should be found that the governor is not guilty, I will not be the last in proclaiming his innocence. I promise to this House that if the committee in charge of the investigation reports that I have been guilty of an improper conduct, I will resign immediately my position. Can E. Mont Reily make the same promise?

I have dealt with this matter probably at greater length than it deserves, but this was for the purpose of finally disposing of the charges that I have been actuated by a personal grievance growing out of the fate of the appropriation made by the Porto Rican General Assembly. I think I have convinced any fair-minded man that this was not the case, and feeling that way I decline in the future to be diverted from my purpose of securing a congressional investigation of the official conduct of the Governor of Porto Rico.

The friends of Reily in this body may resort to throwing sand in the public eyes by charging personal malice; they may draw a red herring across the trail by raising the $5,000 appropriation bogey, but they are not going to divert us from our purpose of having this maladministrator of a helpless people investigated by a jury of his peers. False as his accusations are against me they amount to nothing in considering his case. Reily stands indicted by a whole people, and the charges that he is leveling at his accusers will be futile for the reason that he can not indict a whole people. If he even remotely deserved the emulation of Roosevelt, as he brazenly but safely claims, now that that illustrious man is dead, he will prefer to prove his official conduct "as clean as a hound's tooth" instead of trembling before the possibility of an investigation.

I have information from Porto Rico that the grand jury is investigating the expenditure of the public funds appropriated by the legislature for the office of the governor. It is not my purpose to advance any information about this matter, because the case is under investigation, and it should not be proper to indulge in any comment at this time. I hate to impeach the honesty and integrity of a man under any circumstances, and I only do that when I feel compelled to act under the obligation of a public duty. I was informed that Governor Reily was boasting here in Washington that he had the best appointment that President Harding could award, with a salary of $50,000 a year, but I did not want to lay this charge to the governor in my first speech, for the reason that the information was given to me confidentially and I was not authorized to make it public. Some days ago I read a speech delivered in Kansas City, Mo., by Rev. Dr. Edwin A. Schell, at the Country Club Methodist Church. I quote from that speech:

Apparently the local reporters missed the significance of a recent address before the Lions Club, or were instructed to ignore it out of local pride, at which a new "excellency" boasted that he had the best appointment that President Harding could award and that his salary would be $54,000 a year. While the administration was planting policies of world-wide import—disarmament and a new association of nations—our local celebrity announces the relative importance he sustains by reason of being an "original Harding man" and the perquisites appertaining thereto.

By comparing our official contribution to the administration with the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Commerce, and Agriculture, by contrasting him with the new Chief Justice of the Supreme Court or with the probable Governor General of the Philippines, if, indeed, the comparisons will not be odious, we conclude that the administration needs a new "appointment" secretary and that we grow jackals hereabouts.

When I read this speech I sent a message to Doctor Schell with the purpose of knowing the sources of his remarks, and this is the reply that I received:

KANSAS CITY, MO., March 21, 1922.

Hon. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA,
Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Before Lions Club last July, Reily said in effect governorship of Porto Rico is best political appointment President Harding has to give, and that the salary and perquisites would amount to $54,000 per year. Having visited the Philippine Islands during the administration of Cameron Forbes, without wishing to do injustice to Reily, consider him incompetent for a governship of Porto Rico. Common opinion here confirms me in my judgment.

EDWIN A. SCHELL.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the salary of the Governor of Porto Rico is only $10,000 a year, but the appropriations allowed him for necessary official expenditures, in the disbursement of which he should be guided by the strictest economy and rectitude, amount to nearly $40,000. How could the governor figure $50,000 as his salary? I have been informed that when the governor made this statement he added that in the next four years of his administration the salary will make a total of $200,000.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield? I remember that when this subject was before the House before the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] charged that the Porto Rican Legislature had appropriated $5,000 for your extra expenses, and that Governor Reily vetoed that measure.

Mr. DAVILA. That is a foolish charge.

Mr. STEPHENS. Did Governor Reily ever veto any such measure?

Mr. DAVILA. No, sir. There is not a word of truth in it. I am sorry that a Member of Congress of the United States should repeat such a foolish and unjust charge.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas. I will say that when I made that statement I was not referring to the gentleman.

Mr. TINCHER. I referred to the fact that I had a cablegram in my hand from Governor Reily saying that he had stopped—I used the words "vetoed or stopped"—the payment to the gentleman of $5,000 a year. If you will examine the RECORD, you will see that those were the words that I used. Now, Governor Reily still claims, and has produced some written documents which he claims confirm the statement, that the first official act of his administration was, after conference with the auditor, to stop the payment of that $5,000. That is his statement. I do not charge that.

Mr. DAVILA. I can not yield any further, because I have not the time.

Mr. STEPHENS. I called attention to it because the gentleman from Kansas said that he "vetoed it," and I am asking for information.

Mr. TINCHER. I used the word "veto" or "stop."

Mr. STEPHENS. If the gentleman used the wrong word——

Mr. TINCHER. I did not use the wrong word. Let the gentleman read the RECORD.

Mr. STEPHENS. I did not read the RECORD.

Mr. TINCHER. I quoted the telegram I had in my hand.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman quoted and I heard him, and I am asking for information.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield any further.

The Governor of Porto Rico had no jurisdiction of the matter of the $5,000. If he acted in this matter, it was entirely beyond his jurisdiction. I received a letter from Governor Reily eight days after this alleged conversation with the auditor, in which the governor importuned me to accept a position on the supreme bench of the island.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman, as I understand it, protested against the removal of the auditor and against the $5,000 matter.

Mr. DAVILA. Yes. It is a matter of common knowledge that I opposed the removal of the auditor. In fact, I recommended his reappointment to the Wilson administration, notwithstanding his decision that the appropriation was invalid, just as I opposed his removal to the Harding administration, although Governor Reily finally succeeded in having him removed. This was my consistent attitude toward the auditor, notwithstanding the opinion rendered as to the $5,000. General McIntyre knows that and the Secretary of War knows it. I appeal to them to say whether I did not oppose the removal of the auditor.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. As I understood the gentleman, when he made a speech here he made charges of misconduct on the part of Governor Reily as Governor of Porto Rico, citing what those acts of misconduct were, and the only response to that which we have heard from the governor's friends is not that Governor Reily did not commit the acts, but that the gentleman is mad at Governor Reily.

Mr. DAVILA. Yes; that is the only answer, and it is a very poor answer. The grand jury in Porto Rico is investigating the way in which Governor Reily has expended the public money of the island. Something may come from that investigation which may show plainly that Governor Reily is not the man to rule our people, and is not worthy of the confidence of the national administration.

The Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald, in a recent editorial discussing the Porto Rican situation, said:

FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA, sole representative of 1,300,000 Porto Ricans in the Congress of the United States, rose in his seat last Thursday and solemnly charged Gov. E. Mont Reily, who rules Porto Rico by commission from President Harding, with deeds and words and attitudes inimical to the welfare of the islands and to loyal relations between the United States and its island wards. If the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is any criterion, DAVILA received scant consideration at the hands of the House. But if a proper conception of the delicate importance of our colonial relations be consulted, he should be given careful and decisive attention. It seems to the Herald that even the most violently partisan friend of the new Republican Governor of Porto Rico should approve DAVILA'S concluding plea:

"This matter has become one of national interest. Under these circumstances, to be fair to the governor and to the people of the island, an investigation should be ordered. Either Reily or the people are responsible for the abnormality of the situation. If the governor is innocent, he is entitled to a public exoneration; and if we are right in our complaints, we are entitled to his immediate removal. The good name of the United States demands an investigation. Let the blame rest where it is merited."

Reily has had a tempestuous time in Porto Rico ever since he was sent to his important responsibilities by President Harding. A few weeks ago he returned to Washington for a White House conference in relation to his troubles. The fact that he then went back to San Juan has been taken as indication that the President stands with him in his difficulties. Perhaps he deserves the President's support. Certainly the country will approve the determined stand he took against Porto Rican movements seeking to incite sentiment favorable to separation from the United States. We would be the last to prejudge him on the strength of DAVILA'S impassioned indictment.

On the other hand, DAVILA has been elected three times, by convincing majorities, as the official spokesman of Porto Rico in Washington. Certainly a majority of Porto Ricans have demonstrated themselves to be fine citizens, intensely loyal to the United States. Certainly they have a right to be heard in protest against any phase of imported government under which they are asked to live. And DAVILA'S petition can not be ignored with impunity. He charges Reily with interfering with the island courts and judges; with violating organic law in persisting in appointments contrary to the approval of the native senate; with encouraging island Bolsheviks (despite his opposition to island Separatists); with undermining native faith in the United States by his irritating and domineering methods; and with importing a number of incompetent Missouri politicians (from his home bailiwick of Kansas City) to displace native administrators. Incidentally, DAVILA charges that Reily himself was once thrown out of the assistant postmastership of his home town for incompetence.

These are serious contemplations. Republicanism was properly prompt in an assault upon Bryan in days gone by for trying to fill up the Dominican customs service with "deserving Democrats." It shows poor consistency if it now complacently winks at Reily when he is charged with importing a worthless deputy sheriff from Kansas City to become chief of the secret service of an island whose language he can not even speak. Republicanism was properly critical of Francis Burton Harrison in the Philippines and sent its ablest colonial administrator, Gen. Leonard Wood, to succeed him. It can not afford to be less scrupulous in Porto Rico simply because the new governor is so close to the White House that the President calls him "Monty."

Reily may be 100 per cent all right. DAVILA may be 100 per cent all wrong. But that is neither here nor there. The one sure thing is that Congress and its Republican control will be 100 per cent all wrong if it does not find the truth. "If the governor is innocent, he is entitled to a public exoneration; if the complainants are right they are entitled to his immediate removal." Under existing condition, even though Reily be innocent of all charges, his utility is under serious handicap that must not be perpetual. Under existing condition Porto Rico can not be expected to be happy, nor can Porto Rico be expected to be satisfied. DAVILA has made a fair, square proposition. The Republican control in Congress should not be afraid to take him up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I avail myself of these nine minutes at this time to call attention of the House to a matter about which there is a considerable amount of curiosity throughout the country. I refer to that symbol of disloyalty, the arch slacker, the chief among the 160,000 draft evaders and slackers in the United States, Grover Cleveland Bergdoll. His case marks a certain impotency on the part of this Government, and it seems to me that the administration in charge has a duty to perform. In April, 1921, a committee was appointed by this House to investigate the very sensational features which were connected with the escape on May 21, 1920, of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll from the custody of the United States Army, where he was confined at Fort Jay, undergoing a sentence of five years for the offense against the law. One hundred and five thousand dollars in gold was withdrawn from the United States Treasury directly by the mother of this man and buried somewhere, apparently, from her testimony. The plea was, while he was in confinement at Fort Jay, without any reasonable explanation of why he was not taken to the disciplinary barracks, at Fort Leavenworth, where he should have been sent, that there was a large amount of gold buried by him in a pot in the mountains at the foot of some rainbow, which it was of great importance to him to recover. So the machinery was put in motion ostensibly to recover the gold, but in reality to recover the liberty of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll. There is evidence of an extended conspiracy. "Whoever touches pitch shall be defiled," and every person who has interested himself in the case for Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, or his associates and counsel, has been defiled. Samuel T. Ansell, Maj. (now Col.) John E. Hunt, retired, Judge John W. Westcott, D. Clarence Gibonney, now deceased, and others. I call attention to some peculiar circumstances connected with the case. The officer in command at Fort Jay, Maj. John E. Hunt, did not follow the suggestions that were given to him in a letter of instructions from The Adjutant General of the Army in regard to the care that should be taken concerning this expedition.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Will the gentleman please call the attention of the House to the fact that this very officer was promoted twice while this investigation was going on, that in the meantime the two poor sergeants who were connected with the affair were transferred to other outfits and reduced to privates, and that that officer is now drawing retired pay to-day from the United States Government? I wish the gentleman would elaborate on that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would rather not elaborate, because I am not here to make any charges against any of these people. Charges are suggested by the testimony and the findings set forth in various documents connected with this hearing and the report, but I shall not attempt at this time to say more than that. Every person who seems to have interested himself in behalf of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll is now under suspicion, or worse. Col. C. C. Cresson, who had charge of the prosecution of Hunt before the court-martial which acquitted him, has been recommended for disciplinary action. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell, a practicing attorney at the Washington bar, is recommended for disbarment by this committee. And one attorney contradicts another in the record in such important matters that an honest understanding seems to be impossible. One of the attorneys is now deceased. Among the living, one repudiates any employment with the case; two others swear that he was employed and acted under cover. Grover Cleveland Bergdoll not only evaded the draft successfully but he wrote insulting letters to the authorities showing his contempt for the Government and the power of the United States. He is now in a foreign country, presumably Switzerland. It seems to me that this report, having been on file in this House since August of last year, should be taken up and disposed of. I am informed by a Member from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] that Colonel Cresson is suing certain newspapers for libel on account of things that grew out of the case.

The reputations of men concerned with this matter either ought to be made clear or the truth made known. Further than that, it is contended by one of the Members making the majority report that counsel were employed unnecessarily in this case, because there was a complaint and criticism of the composition of this committee in that it included no ex-service man.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include in the RECORD two letters passing between two members of this committee, showing the time, nature, and conditions of employment of two counsel before this committee, and further to indicate to the House at this time that neither one of these attorneys has seen fit to present any voucher for the payment of those fees; that counsel for this committee disagree with the majority members of the committee and were tending with their influence to persuade that committee not to make the findings that it did. This is altogether such a mess as to demand the early attention of the House.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. When the resolution was in the House before we had not then resumed diplomatic negotiations with Germany, where this gentleman at that time was taken to be. Now, since these diplomatic relations have been resumed, what is the obstacle to bringing this man back for trial?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because he has sought refuge, as I understand it, in the Republic of Switzerland at this time.

I want this Government to take every honest and available means to bring this man back into custody of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks and to insert the two letters which I mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Following are the letters referred to:

[From Hon. John A. Peters, third district of Maine; home address, Ellsworth, Me.]

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. BEN JOHNSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I want to pay the remaining bills contracted by the Bergdoll committee, and ask your approval of the following:

Just before the recess I had the disbursing clerk give me the amount of our disbursements to date, and I find that it is just about $3,000. This includes all the expenses except counsel fees.

With the consent of the committee I engaged counsel. I arranged with General Sherbourne, the principal counsel, that he should receive $100 per day and expenses. He has been paid his actual expenses, and I have his bill which represents a total of 28 days' actual time spent. I propose to approve his bill and put through a voucher for $2,800.

Owing to certain criticisms touching the nonmilitary composition of our committee, both General Sherbourne and I thought it wise to engage as assistant counsel Mr. John Thomas Taylor, a prominent member of the American Legion, and its leading representative in Washington. Before I left Washington I had a talk with him in relation to his bill, and he told me that he always received $100 per diem for congressional work, but that he would cheerfully leave this matter to the committee. I do not think that it is fitting that the assistant counsel should receive the same amount that the leading counsel receives, and I suggest that $50 per day would be a more appropriate sum.

We shall be well within the appropriation of $10,000 at these figures, and of course we are all anxious to make a good financial showing, at the same time being fair and even liberal with counsel.

I am writing this to your office in Washington, not knowing your present location, but doubtless it will be forwarded.

Will you be kind enough to write me at Ellsworth, Me., and give me your views on the above suggestions. I would like to close the matter up at an early date and not ask the lawyers to wait for their fees.

Very truly yours,

JOHN A. PETERS.

[Copy of letter from Congressman BEN JOHNSON to ex-Congressman John A. Peters.]

BARDSTOWN, KY., September 7, 1921.

Hon. JOHN A. PETERS,
Ellsworth, Me.

MY DEAR MR. PETERS: I am just in receipt of your letter of 3d instant, asking that I approve compensations of $100 and expenses a day for Mr. Sherbourne as counsel for the Bergdoll committee, and half that sum for Mr. Taylor as assistant counsel for the committee.

I regret exceedingly that I feel that I can approve neither; first, because neither was necessary; and next, because both, in my opinion, are excessive.

It is not my purpose, either now or hereafter, to criticize any of your actions as chairman of the committee; and I would conclude this letter at this point except for the expression in your letter that you had engaged counsel for the committee with the consent of the committee.

I attended every meeting of the committee, and I feel that I can safely say that at no time was the question of employing or not employing counsel ever put to the committee.

At one of the early meetings of the committee, held in the Naval Affairs Committee room, you announced that you had decided to employ counsel and that you had made inquiries into the suitableness of one, whose name you did not call, and that you were awaiting an answer to a telegram of inquiry which you had sent to California.

After you had made this announcement I ventured the suggestion that you employ some one of whose character and ability you had personal knowledge. A day or so thereafter you told me you had employed Mr. Sherbourne.

That is all the action taken by the committee relative to the matter. However, it is but fair to say that the failure at the time of the committee to protest your decision to employ the one of whom you spoke on the occasion referred to warranted you in making that employment at a compensation approved by the committee, which latter was not done.

In this connection it is not out of place to say that the employment of Taylor was never submitted to the committee, and I never heard of his employment until I saw his name, as assistant counsel, printed on some of the hearings.

You spoke in your letter of certain criticisms touching the nonmilitary composition of the committee and that you and Mr. Sherbourne thought it wise to employ Mr. Taylor as assistant counsel because he was a prominent member of the American Legion and its leading representative in Washington. I never heard of the criticism of which you write, and if I had I would not have been willing to expend the public money either to quiet the criticism or to employ unnecessary counsel merely to secure the approval of any organization relative to the conduct of the committee. That should be judged on its real merit rather than on any approval or disapproval which in the least might savor of purchased sympathy or bias.

Very truly yours,

BEN JOHNSON.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOWELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11065) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in the regular 8-point type and insert therein two addresses made at New York on Sunday, on the occasion of the ceremonies for the returned soldier dead.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

REMARKS OF HON. THOMAS S. CRAGO, OF PENNSYLVANIA, RELATIVE TO THE CEREMONIES FOR THE RETURNED SOLDIER DEAD HELD IN NEW YORK CITY ON SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1922.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the committee from the House appointed to attend the service in honor of the returned soldier dead to be held in New York City April 2, I wish to report that your committee attended this sacred service, and, by permission of the House, I am inserting herewith the addresses made by Senator CALDER, of New York, and by Colonel Wainwright, the Assistant Secretary of War.

This practically completes the work of returning to their homes the men who fell in France; and the services on this occasion, participated in by more than 15,000 people, under the auspices of the War Department, the Navy Department, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United Spanish War Veterans, the Grand Army of the Republic, and so many other loyal and patriotic organizations and people, evidenced the fact that we have not forgotten our fallen heroes, and that this Republic will ever hold in grateful remembrance the sacrifice these men made.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR WILLIAM M. CALDER AT THE ARMY BASE, BROOKLYN, N. Y., SUNDAY, APRIL 2, IN CONNECTION WITH THE MEMORIAL EXERCISES FOR THE RECEPTION AND DISPOSITION OF THE LAST CONTINGENT OF AMERICAN SOLDIER DEAD FROM FRANCE.

When Americans gather as we do here, how can they escape the conviction that in this governmental partnership of ours some make contributions to the National Treasury beyond calculation in dollars and cents? Seventy thousand homes, of which 1,064 are here represented, miss the gladsome ring of the voice of a stalwart youth, because, perchance, its last joyous note was interrupted as it urged comrades onward at Cantigny, Chateau-Thierry, or St. Mihiel. Our greatest reserve fund is the inspiration created by the sacrifices of heroic men and women for the Nation. To that fund these 70,000 families have made tremendous contributions.

You parents and friends of these noble dead know too well how feeble are words to heal the wounds that war has made, and how even time does not make them less deep. We gather not that we may console you, but to acknowledge the everlasting indebtedness of a grateful people to you and to them.

Fellow Americans, while we thus gather to acknowledge our indebtedness, it is well to remember that in the vocabulary of these youths "obligation" as well as "privilege" had a place. I have spoken of this Nation as a governmental partnership. These noble dead gave their all to that partnership. They, too, had an equal right to the privileges of American citizenship with those who eternally speak of the rights and privileges which belong to them. But these dead knew that unless the burdens and responsibilities of citizenship were cheerfully assumed, the privileges of that citizenship would not be worth the claiming. As a people, we should be exceedingly thankful that the great body of our citizenship do in fact appreciate that governmental obligations are impossible. This was made evident by the peaceable conduct of the universal draft. Never was a test more severe put to the work of the institutions of a free people and never did institutions justify themselves so magnificently. Beneath the occasional clamor for complete change and revolution of our system of government there lies the failure to grasp the truth that popular government requires the surrender of some rights in order that greater rights may be secured. The widespread recognition of this truth by our people is the argument which can not be answered by those who oppose and deride popular forms of government.

It is likewise the guaranty that those who promise a day when there shall be no civil duties but only civil privileges will fail to fool our citizenship. These mute forms, in unmatched eloquence, call for a more perfect acceptance of the high standards of responsibility which they and the gallant thousands of other days believed necessary for the creation and perpetuation of constitutional government. While these call for a more perfect acceptance of those standards, we rejoice in the knowledge that here is the testimonial that in every rank and condition among us there has been conformity to those standards. Here are the sons of native and foreign born, of farmers and factory hands, of rich and poor. Unmistakably they tell the tale of racial and religious and social differences forgotten in a mighty effort to promote that more perfect union for which our form of government was ordained by its founders.

My fellow citizens, the high standard of unity which these heroes followed can not be forsaken if the tasks of peace shall be met by living Americans as these dead Americans met the tasks of war. Resolutely we must stand against those who would divide the national unity of which the blood of these dead is the sacred cement. Bigotry and intolerance must not supplant mutual confidence and tolerance.

These lifeless forms are a thousand challenges to us to carry on the construction of the more perfect union necessary to the solution of the problems of mankind. Among the greatest of these problems is the preservation of peace itself. It can not be considered ungenerous for an American to state that in war Americans arrived when the need was greatest. We heartened and encouraged our allies. They went on and won with us. Won with the man power we supplied plus the man power we still were able to supply. Behind our lines and the lines of our allies there appeared to the consciousness both of our allies and our enemies a host still greater than we had sent. The world knew that America meant business.

Men and women, we can preserve the generations of the future from any scenes such as this if we, as a Nation, shall so resolve. Without the sacrifice of a fundamental American principle, we can agree that the sword will not be drawn until and unless national honor can not be otherwise maintained.

Under the same institutions and form of government by which these noble dead were inspired to sacrifice their all we can develop a public opinion in suppport of international arbitration which will hearten and encourage a like public opinion in every civilized nation on the face of the earth.

The surest way to escape participation in the conflicts of the future is by participation in the removal of the causes or war or in the adjustment of those causes by a substitute for war. While it may be that the causes can not all be removed nor a sufficient substitute be found, nevertheless the death of these men will not have been in vain if the world shall move forward along the path to peace.

My heart to-day goes out to you, the fathers and mothers and loved ones of these boys. I can readily understand that it is difficult for you to reconcile yourselves to the thought that they should have died so young. They left you as your precious boys just entering into manhood, and now their labors are finished. The span of life is not measured by years but by achievement. These heroes of ours, during the few brief months of their life across the sea, lived ages. They achieved the highest thing a human being can achieve, for "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Each did a man's full duty; he flinched not nor did he falter. They achieved, they accomplished, they triumphed. They will forever live in the memory of a grateful Nation and in the hearts of the peace-loving peoples of the world. They have erected a monument by their deeds of valor which the ravages of time may not destroy.

REMARKS OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR AT THE CEREMONIES FOR THE RETURNED SOLDIER DEAD, NEW YORK CITY, APRIL 2, 1922.

In yonder covered pier are more than a thousand flag-draped caskets similar to the one before us. They are the last to come home. We, their comrades, and this great throng are here to pay them a last sad, fender farewell.

We stand, indeed, in the presence of our heroic dead. The freedom of mankind was their battle cry. They fought for eternal right and justice, as did the founders of this great Republic. These were no common souls. They fought and died for their country. In what nobler cause could man fight? How better could man die? No words can do fitting honor to their memory nor bespeak the measure of our devotion. Their story will live to inspire future generations of Americans down through the ages. They gave all, and in the giving gave us the example not only of how Americans can die but how they should live.

This is an historic occasion. We have seen the living and the dead return from that conflict in which this Nation cast its great strength in order that the decision should provide justice and peace for the world. Now that time has come when we have an opportunity to pay our respects to the last contingent of those who seek everlasting peace in the land whose flag they carried to victory.

In paying homage to these, the last heroic dead to be returned from France, we also honor their comrades who rest in our national cemeteries in Europe and those whose bodies have already been returned to their own country. Of our 77,080 heroic dead of the World War, 31,520 remain in our national cemeteries of France, England, and Belgium. Their graves, row on row, are mute evidence that in civilization's hour of need America answered, and that Americans are willing to die that liberty, so dear to us, may live. The bodies of 181 have found their final resting place in other foreign countries. These will be joined by 444 others. To their graves their relatives will lead their friends to hear the story of their lives and learn something of what our country means to the liberty of the world.

Forty-five thousand four hundred and fifty-nine have been returned to our own country. They rest in our national and private cemeteries over the wide stretch of our country, and provide shrines of patriotism at which our countrymen may kneel.

We are thankful that our unknown dead is less than 2 per cent of the number who fell, and that almost all can know where their hero sleeps. In this we are more fortunate than other nations, whose unknown dead amounts in some cases to almost 45 per cent.

Each whom we know has found that final resting place desired by those nearest and dearest to him. We mourn with the patriotic mothers and wives who gave their loved ones, and in honoring our heroic dead we also honor them. No mother, no wife ever gave son or husband in a better cause, nor did a son or husband ever meet a nobler death.

Let us resolve to forever honor the memory of these sons of America by perpetuating the cause in which they gave their lives. Our country must always strive for peace and justice in the world, even though we hazard our existence. Individually and collectively let us see to it, that should America ever be called upon again to wage the fight for civilization, that she shall be equal to the task, that her defenses shall not be crumpled, nor her strength dissipated. May no American ever be called upon to give his life unnecessarily because of omission on our part. These dead must not have died in vain.

Heroic dead! Each one of you is now enshrined in the heart of a grateful Nation. Dear comrades, we who clasped hands with you, laughed with you, sang with you, lived with you, crossed seas with you, fought with you, now bid you a last goodby. You will be ever in our thoughts and on our hearts.

Heroic dead, we salute you! Sweet be your deathless sleep. You live with the immortals. Hail and farewell!

TARIFF ON PEANUTS AND OTHER FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the tariff on peanuts, peanut oils, and other vegetable oils, and include a letter and telegram from Mr. W. W. Webb, president of the Georgia Peanut Growers' Association, and also a telegram from the Country Bankers' Association of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to have printed at this time a letter and a telegram from the Hon. W. W. Webb, of Hahira, Ga., president of the Georgia Peanut Growers' Association; also I wish to have printed a telegram from the Country Bankers' Association of Georgia. I want the Congress and the country to have the benefit of these communications now while the question of tariff on peanuts and other farm products is being considered in the Senate. Regardless of what the Senate may do, the tariff bill will come back to the House on a conference report. Let all the friends of the farmers in Congress do everything possible along the lines sought in these communications.

The Hon. W. W. Webb, president of the Georgia Peanut Growers' Association, is a friend of the farmers, true and tried, and is devoting his magnificent energy and his all to their service. I wish we had many, many more like him, with a noble vision of the great possibilities of the agricultural interest and with a steadfast faith in their accomplishment, evidenced by his noble efforts in behalf of the men who toil on the farm. We would all do well to study closely his timely suggestions.

The letter and telegrams referred to are as follows:

HAHIRA, GA., January 9, 1922.

Hon. W. C. LANKFORD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE: I am glad you are taking such a firm stand in behalf of the same tariff on certain agricultural products as is placed on the things the farmers must buy. I am interested in tariff on all farm products, and especially on peanuts.

The cotton farmers in the boll-weevil section substituted peanuts for cotton as a money crop. They found a profitable market. New machinery was installed and many products were developed out of peanuts—more than 72 in all. It has been proven by scientists that if every other product was destroyed the peanut would furnish food for man and feed for stock of the greatest values. Many luxuries are made from peanuts. All of which increase the consumption and demand. The advancing price made a happy country, especially in south Georgia, Alabama, and other States. The importation of oriental peanuts crept in to reap the benefits of American development of the many products of peanuts, but the farmers were protected by an embargo on oriental peanuts. The increasing price under the embargo brought prosperity to every business in the peanut belt.

We could not have an overproduction, the product had become so useful. The acreage was increased in 1920, with a full assurance of a profitable price, but, alas! while we were rejoicing the embargo was lifted unexpectedly and the oriental peanuts came in and blighted the hopes of our country with ruinous prices and absolutely destroyed the southern peanut industry. Having witnessed the good effects of the embargo on peanuts, in that it made us a prosperous people, we are asking to-day for protection on peanuts. The present administration is going to run the Government on a protective-tariff basis. If our southern Congressmen can not prevent protection on what the southern farmers have to buy, they certainly should try and get equal protection on what they have to sell.

They say that we will have to pay high for sugar and rice on account of tariff. I have been asked if I would vote for 2 cents per pound on sugar and rice if I could get 4 cents per pound tariff on peanuts. My answer is that I am willing for a tariff on everything else, if we can get 4 cents per pound on peanuts and on sufficient other farm products to equal or overcome the increased cost on articles we purchase. For a barrel of either sugar or rice would not be cheap to me at a penny a barrel if I did not have the penny. And if I had to get the penny as a profit on peanuts at the present price, I could not buy any sugar or rice; but if we get 4 cents per pound on peanuts, I can eat some of either at a high price. It is far better to make it possible, with protection, to buy sugar and rice at a high price than to make it impossible to buy it at a low price. Give us protection on peanuts and make us financially able to buy, rather than reduce us to a level with the foreign pauper labor. Protect us against Chinese and Japanese peanuts. Let the Chinese learn to eat their own, and they will not be blighting our prosperity with their products and at the same time appealing to the charities of America.

Let the Japanese and Chinese learn to eat more peanuts and peanut products, the best human food in the world. It will save them from starvation, and it will save the peanut growers of the South at the same time. We should protect the agricultural interests of our country, for it is the basis of our prosperity. If you can not get the tariff off of everything we buy, then for the sake of the tiller of the soil get it on peanuts and every farm product which will help the farmer.

A fair illustration is this: There is a town of 20,000 inhabitants. The incorporate limits includes quite a fine tract of timber. This timber could be sold and marketed very profitably if the trade from out of the corporate limits could be stopped. The mayor and council decided to put on a tariff to keep out competition, and the mayor in the meantime trades for all the timber. This went well for him. He could cut and sell at his own high price, for he had no competition. At the next meeting of the council one of its members, who was the owner of the only large flour and meal mill in the town, being a victim of the high-priced wood, proposed that since the tariff on wood was working so fine that the same tariff be granted on foodstuffs. This they did. All went well. At the next meeting of the council another member, who had in the town the only mill which was turning out cloth to supply the town, being a victim of high-priced wood and bread, proposed that since all was working so well they give him the same protection to his cloth. This they did. All went well. At the next meeting of the council the last man to be heard from was a shoe manufacturer, and he came forward with a similar request to those presented by, first, the fuel or timber man; second, the bread man; and, third, the cloth man. The lumberman, the first to get protection, now rises to speak. He says that as long as he was the only beneficiary the tariff was fine, but now since all are in the game he proposes that they do away with tariff altogether or use it only as a means of raising revenue. So it is when all are treated on a common level or on the same basis. So I appeal to you, as the peanut industry in the South is now drawing its last breath and will soon pass on to the hands of the undertaker, that you save its life while you may. The peanut price is far below cost of production.

In the consideration of tariff on peanuts it is only a question of whom our Government is in sympathy with, America or foreign nations. To reduce our people and our laborers to a level of those of foreign countries has a far-reaching effect. It brings not the price alone down but it brings everything else down with it. The morale of no country exceeds the prosperity of its working citizens. The agricultural industry is the basis of southern prosperity, and drag it down and you drag down its citizenship.

A horticulturist who goes out to prune in his orchard, not understanding his task, may cut the taproot of the tree instead of the needless growth. In so doing the tree dies. So with tariff revisers—they need to study the case lest they cut the taproot of our country's prosperity and thus reap for themselves and others a harvest of blighted and disheartened citizens. If the southern farmers can be assured of protection, they will plant a crop of peanuts in 1922 that will start the wheels of the machine called prosperity to running and grind out a blessing that will mean the enrichment of America. Otherwise the South loses in its efforts to make a success of the peanut industry and China and Japan win.

I certainly hope that you and those striving to get a fair deal for the farmers in the matter of tariff may prevail.

Sincerely yours,

W. W. WEBB,
President Georgia Peanut Growers' Association.

ATLANTA, GA., March 25, 1922.

Hon. WM. C. LANKFORD, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Our farmers are greatly disturbed about peanuts and vegetable oils being placed on the free list. If this is done, our peanut industry will suffer irreparable damage. If assured of protection, our acreage will be maintained; on the other hand, if assurance is not given them quickly, the acreage will be reduced 75 per cent the coming season. Oriental oils in competition will seriously affect our hog production also. The crippling of these two important branches of farm industry will prove a calamity. We pray your best efforts to defeat this movement, as our people are already crushed with the ravages of the boll weevil and are now threatened with this influx of oriental oils and peanuts. We can but fear this influx of oriental oils and peanuts will tend to place our farmers on the low level of cheap oriental labor. Georgia farmers are unanimous for protection on farm products the same as on manufactured articles.

W. W. WEBB,
President Georgia Peanut Growers' Association.

ATLANTA, GA., March 29, 1922.

Hon. W. C. LANKFORD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

While the country bankers of Georgia are not very strong on tariffs, yet since we are going to have a protective tariff we ask that this tariff bill extend its protection to the products of the farmer, especially peanuts, peanut oils, and cottonseed oils that are affected by the importation of foreign soy-bean oil, peanuts, and peanut oils. If the present tariff is removed the farmers will get approximately $8 per ton less for their cotton seed and approximately $15 per ton less on peanuts. The farmers need this protection against oriental labor and must have it.

COUNTRY BANKERS' ASSOCIATION OF GEORGIA.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 5, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, Thou art the author and giver of life. Thou hast given to us our span of life. We would spend it before Thee agreeable to Thy good pleasure. While we think many times our paths are strange and we know not how to go, we bless Thee that there is light from Thy presence and that where we fail to understand we can trust Thee to lead us in every line of duty, and Thou canst illumine the way for our feet. We humbly ask Thee this morning for Thy help and strength. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, April 3, 1922, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wished to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I understand the chairman is not here and I do not know who are the other members of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. The chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is a member of the Committee on Finance and is engaged at a hearing of that committee. I will send for him if the Senator desires.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator from Kansas would send for him. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] was called away from the city, but before he left he introduced the ordinary resolution providing that authority be given the Committee on Patents to hold hearings and take testimony. It was referred, of course, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I am informed by the Senator from California, who is chairman of the Committee on Patents, that a meeting of that committee is called for to-morrow to have hearings and to take testimony on a very important bill pending before the committee.

It is quite important therefore that the resolution should be passed to-day. There can be no objection to it. I have not examined it, but I assume it is in the regular form of resolutions passed in reference to hearings before all committees. I ask the Senator from Kansas if he will send for the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], who is chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I have sent for the chairman of the committee, and as soon as he comes I will speak to him about the resolution. It can be taken up by unanimous consent later in the day.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War transmitting an offer from Charles L. Parsons, of Washington, D. C., covering certain properties at Sheffield, Ala., and the first hundred thousand kilowatts of secondary power to be derived from the proposed water-power development at Muscle Shoals, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the New Mexico Wool Growers' Association at Albuquerque, N. Mex., March 16–17, 1922, favoring the passage of the Capper-French truth in fabric bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE presented a letter in the nature of a petition of the Grain Trade Association of the San Francisco (Calif.) Chamber of Commerce, giving their views relative to the enactment of legislation to legalize the manufacture and sale of light wines and beers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Sacramento (Calif.) Grange, No. 12, favoring the passage of the Fordney tariff bill and inclusion therein of the American valuation plan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petitions of Janet Richards, Mrs. Court F. Wood, and sundry members of the District of Columbia Federation of Women's Clubs, in the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit experiments upon living dogs in the District of Columbia or the territorial or insular possessions of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain resolutions adopted by the live stock convention with reference to legislation desired at the hands of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to know what is the matter which it is desired may be printed in the RECORD? Is it a resolution, or what is it?

Mr. BURSUM. I have asked to have printed in the RECORD resolutions which have been adopted by the Live Stock Association in convention assembled, asking certain legislation from Congress.

Mr. CURTIS. And the Senator desires to have them noted in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committees?

Mr. BURSUM. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolutions presented by the Senator from New Mexico will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think there is a misunderstanding regarding the petitions presented by the Senator from New Mexico. I understood the Senator desired the petitions noted in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committees. Is that correct?

Mr. BURSUM. I desire to have them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand they are quite long.

Mr. BURSUM. No; they are very short. There are a number of papers accompanying the resolutions, but the resolutions themselves are very short; they will not occupy more than a page of the RECORD all told.

Mr. CURTIS. Could not one of the resolutions be printed without the names?

Mr. BURSUM. The resolutions refer to several different subjects, such as the activities of the Biological Survey, war-finance legislation, the payment of fees on forest reserves, and the tariff.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that the rule be followed and that they be noted in the RECORD and referred to the proper committee. In that way they will be printed by title, and the RECORD will indicate what they contain.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, the only object in asking that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD is that the Senate may be advised as to the desires of those engaged in the live-stock industry. The printing of the resolutions, as I have said, will not occupy more than a page.

Mr. CURTIS. I shall not object.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is it understood that the names signed to the petitions are to be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BURSUM. Oh, no; merely the contents of the resolutions. As I have said, the whole thing will not take up a page.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

The resolutions were referred as below indicated.

Resolution thanking our Representatives in Congress.

In full realization of the great interest and earnest endeavor of our Representatives in Congress to further the interests of the stockmen of this State, and with full appreciation of results already obtained—

Resolved by the New Mexico Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, in convention assembled at Las Vegas, N. Mex., March 20–21, 1922, That we express our sincere thanks to said Representatives for what they have done for us in the past and are planning to do for us in the future.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Truth in fabric resolution.

Resolved by the New Mexico Wool Growers' Association, in convention assembled in Albuquerque, N. Mex., March 16–17, 1922, That we believe in the honest labeling of all products; that we deplore the use of shoddy in the manufacture and sale of so-called all-wool goods under the term "all wool," which term is construed by the public to mean "virgin wool"; that we consider the French-Capper bill, now pending in Congress, the best effort yet attempted to correct such fraudulent practices, and that this convention indorses the French-Capper bill and urges its immediate enactment.

To the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Cooperative work resolution.

Resolved by the New Mexico Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, in convention assembled at Las Vegas, N. Mex., March 20–21, 1922, That we most strongly indorse the work of the United States Biological Survey in the destruction of predatory animals and range-destroying rodents in this State; and be it further

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend the continuance of a committee to cooperate with them in their work and to join with a committee from the New Mexico Wool Growers' Association in making a study of the most practicable way to obtain for the Biological Survey a more stable source of revenue with which to continue their meritorious work.

To the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Federal reserve bank resolution.

Whereas the Federal reserve banking system was created principally in the interest of our commercial institutions; and

Whereas present banking facilities are inadequate to properly finance agricultural and live-stock raising; and

Whereas long-term credits and the acceptance for loans of ranch property as collateral are absolutely essential to a stabilization of these industries: Therefore be it

Resolved by the New Mexico Wool Growers' Association in convention assembled in Albuquerque, N. Mex., March 16–17, 1922, That Congress amend the Federal reserve banking act so that long-time loans may be extended to live-stock growers and agriculturists; and be it further

Resolved, That lands and ranch property be accepted as collateral.

To the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Resolution recommending amendment of farm loan act and increase of loan limit.

Whereas owing to drought and deflation many live-stock producers who have invested the earnings of a lifetime in ranches and improvements now have their ranches inadequately stocked and due to lack of live-stock collateral are unable to avail themselves of the benefits to be obtained from the War Finance Corporation; and

Whereas there is now functioning a Government agency operating through Federal farm-loan banks, providing farmers with funds at a low rate of interest for a period of 33½ years, but with the amount for which any individual can apply so small that it is impracticable for the live-stock producers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New Mexico Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, in convention assembled at Las Vegas, N. Mex., March 20 and 21, 1922, recommends the enactment at this session of Congress of an amendment of the Federal farm loan act to include more fully grazing lands and improvements and a substantial increase of the loan limit; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of Agriculture and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

To the Committee on Banking and Currency.

War Finance Corporation resolution.

Whereas since the War Finance Corporation has been revived and the scope of its work broadened to include the business of financing our live-stock and agricultural industries; and since the corporation has created machinery through which the live-stock and agricultural industries may be financed, and is attempting to secure the cooperation of the banks and lve-stock loan companies that are financing the industries: It is therefore

Resolved by the New Mexico Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, in convention assembled in Las Vegas, N. Mex., March 20 and 21, 1922, That we heartily indorse the action of Congress in passing legislation to help solve this reconstruction problem of the live-stock industries, and we further pray that the time for accepting new loans be extended and applications be accepted for loans up to January 1, 1923.

To the Committee on Finance.

Import duties resolution.

Whereas a measure relating to import duties will doubtless be considered during the present session of Congress, and since we believe our industries can not survive unless we are protected in our home markets; and, further, that the financial condition of those engaged in the basic industries—farming and stock growing—has a direct relation to the financial condition of every other person in the United States, no matter what his occupation may be: It is therefore

Resolved by the New Mexico Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, in convention assembled in Las Vegas, N. Mex., March 20 and 21, 1922, That we favor a substantial tariff upon live stock, agricultural, and meat products, and urge that there be fixed a duty of 6 cents per pound on dry, and 3 cents per pound on green hides. We indorse the truth-in-fabric measure, and urge the immediate passage of the same, and protest against the indifference of the merchants of the country in regard to this bill, believing that their lack of interest is not justifiable.

To the Committee on Finance.

Tariff resolution.

Whereas the sheep industry was threatened with annihilation by importations of cheap foreign wools and frozen lamb until the enactment of the Fordney emergency tariff bill; and

Whereas our costs of production can not be reduced to anywhere near prewar costs; and

Whereas farmers, bankers, merchants, and all classes of citizens, particularly in the West, are dependent on a stable and prosperous live-stock industry; and

Whereas the Southern Tariff Association and the farmers of the country, in conference recently in Washington, advocated proper protection for all agricultural and live-stock products: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New Mexico Woolgrowers in convention assembled in Albuquerque, N. Mex., March 16–17, 1922, urge upon Congress the necessity of a specific duty on all wools used in the manufacture of wearing apparel imported into this country to the amount of 33 cents per pound based on scoured content, together with consistent duties on wool and wool on pelts, waste, and shoddy; and be it further

Resolved, That we favor adequate compensatory and protective duties on imports of articles manufactured from wool; and be it further

Resolved, That we favor a duty of 5 cents per pound on imported lamb and mutton, and 6 cents per pound duty on dry, and 3 cents per pound duty on green hides; be it further

Resolved, That we favor the use of American valuations as the basis of levying import duties, and are altogether opposed to ad valorem limitations on specific duties.

To the Committee on Finance.

Resolution indorsing Senate bill 3149.

Be it resolved, That the New Mexico Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, in convention assembled at Las Vegas, N. Mex., March 20–21, 1922, hereby expresses its earnest approval of Senate bill 3149, introduced by Senator H. O. BURSUM, respecting the transfer of all public domain from Federal ownership and control to that of the State, and copies of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of the Interior and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress.

To the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Resolution protesting against transfers.

Whereas a movement is now pending in Congress to transfer in whole the control of the Forest Service from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior, and since we are of the opinion that the administration of this work can be handled more advantageously and with less duplication in the Department of Agriculture: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the New Mexico Cattle and Horse Growers' Association in convention assembled in Las Vegas, N. Mex., March 20 and 21, 1922, That we protest against this transfer being made; that it is now in the proper department for the best interest of the live-stock industries, and should remain where it is.

We believe the same to be true of the Bureau of Markets, and we ask that the administration of the same be left to the Department of Agriculture.

To the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Public domain resolution.

Resolved, That the New Mexico Wool Growers' Association, in convention assembled in Albuquerque, N. Mex., March 16–17, 1922, approve Senator BURSUM'S bill, S. 3149, relative to the handling of public lands in New Mexico; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to our Representatives in Congress and to the chairmen of the Public Land Committees of the House and Senate.

To the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Payment of grazing fees on national forests resolution.

Whereas the holders of grazing permits on the national forests of New Mexico are not in a financial position to pay any part of the grazing fees due April 1, 1922: Be it

Resolved by the New Mexico Wool Growers' Association in convention assembled in Albuquerque, N. Mex., March 16–17, 1922, That the payment of the 1922 grazing fees be deferred till December 1, 1922.

To the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COLT. From the Committee on Immigration I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 268) extending the operation of the immigration act of May 19, 1921. The amendment continues for two years, instead of one year, the 3 per cent immigration restriction provision contained in the present law. I ask that the joint resolution be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 3169) to equalize pensions of retired policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 589) thereon.

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 6569. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors (Rept. No. 590); and

H. R. 7340. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war (Rept. No. 591).

Mr. HEFLIN, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 2579) to provide for the publication of estimates of unginned cotton;

A bill (S. 3220) to amend section 2 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916; and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 187) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish additional cotton statistics.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on April 4, 1922, they presented to the President of the United States the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 160) authorizing the extension, for a period of not to exceed 25 years, of the time for the payment of the principal and interest of the debt incurred by Austria for the purchase of flour from the United States Grain Corporation, and for other purposes.

CONGAREE RIVER BRIDGE, S. C.

Mr. DIAL. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3360) to authorize the building of a bridge across the Congaree River in South Carolina, and I submit a report (No. 592) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Richland-Calhoun River Bridge Commission be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Congaree River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation and at or near a point known as Bates Ferry, between the counties of Richland and Calhoun, S. C., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DONATION OF ABANDONED BUILDINGS AT NOME, ALASKA.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 249, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to donate and grant certain buildings in Alaska to the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for the passage of which there is an emergency. I do not think there will be any objection whatever to it; I am sure there will not be.

The circumstances are these: The War Department had a post at Nome, Alaska, called Fort Davis. On that post there were certain temporary wooden structures erected. The post has been abandoned. The structures are of no use whatever to the Government, but the women at Nome have asked the department for some of the buildings for hospital purposes. The Secretary of the Interior wants to grant them, but lacks the authority, and the joint resolution simply gives him the necessary authority.

I have a telegram from the ladies interested stating that unless the joint resolution is immediately passed, so that they may take advantage of the snow for the removal of the buildings, the whole purpose will fail and the donation will be of no use. That is the reason why I ask that the joint resolution may be considered. It has already passed the House.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the joint resolution be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The reading clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate and grant to the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church not exceeding three of the frame buildings on the abandoned Fort Davis Military Reservation in or near Nome, Alaska, the material so donated to be used for the erection of a hospital by said society for the use of white and native residents of the Nome district, Alaska.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been reported favorably by the committee?

Mr. NEW. The committee reports favorably, and the Secretary of the Interior wants to have the donation made.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment Senate resolution 268, which is designed to permit the Committee on Patents to hold hearings and to employ a stenographer, as all other standing committees have authority to do. For some reason, however, the resolution was not adopted at the beginning of the present Congress. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the resolution be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 268) submitted by Mr. JOHNSON on April 3, 1922, was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-seventh Congress to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 3398) declaring the railway bridge across the Kansas River in the State of Kansas, at a place about 1,578 feet from its mouth, in the city of Kansas City, Kans., an obstruction to navigation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 3399) for the relief of the Indians of the Gila River and Papago Reservations in Arizona; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 3400) granting a pension to Ammon M. Tenney; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3401) to authorize the Bear Mountain Hudson River Bridge Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River near the village of Peekskill, State of New York; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 3402) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHORTRIDGE:

A bill (S. 3403) to provide a uniform rule of naturalization and to amend and codify the laws relating to the acquisition and loss of citizenship, to equalize the citizenship status of men and women, to establish a method for the registration of aliens for their better guidance and protection, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 3404) granting an increase of pension to Charles Burrows; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3405) for the relief of the surviving children of John Moylan; to the Committee on Claims.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. STERLING. I have a letter from the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST], who was called suddenly from the city, leaving at midnight last night. As he can not be present to-day, he sent to me an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9103, the judicial bill, now pending. He desires to have the amendment printed, and I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOSPITALIZATION OF EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10864) to authorize an appropriation to enable the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau to provide for the construction of additional hospital facilities and to provide medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies for persons who served in the World War and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

FRANCES KELLY.

Mr. BORAH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9275) for the relief of Frances Kelly, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask that it may be read and then lie upon the table. During the afternoon, if I can secure the floor, I desire to submit a few observations in support of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 270), as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that there is waste, inefficiency, and extravagance in the administration of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, due in part to the disorganized and demoralized condition of the bureau, caused by attempts to replace and reassign personnel for partisan purposes; and

Whereas it is alleged that the work of the recovery and collection of delinquent taxes, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, has been delayed by reason of assigning personnel to the work of auditing claims against the Treasury, for the refund of taxes already collected, and of claims for tax exemption, and that such claims are being injudiciously allowed to the detriment of the Government; and

Whereas it is claimed that numerous tax attorneys, agents, specialists, advisers, and lobbyists in the employ of claimants for refunds and exemptions, some of whom, it is claimed, pretend to have partisan political influence, are carrying on negotiations with officers of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, in regard to the allowance of such claims, which negotiations preclude a judicious examination of and action upon such claims, and will result in scandal, and the disadvantage of the Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the aforesaid matters, and to report to the Senate whether or not it be advisable to make a public record of tax exemption and tax-refund claims which have been decided or which are pending before the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and whether or not it be advisable to establish a court or public tribunal for the handling and allowance of claims for tax exemptions and refunds filed with the Bureau of Internal Revenue; and to recommend effective measures to relieve the Bureau of Internal Revenue from the influence of partisan politics. The committee is authorized to administer oaths, to send for persons and papers, and to employ such clerical and professional assistance as may be necessary, payment therefor to be made out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon the order of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I presume the resolution which has just been read will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, will it not?

Mr. KING. I have asked that the resolution lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table.

APPOINTMENTS TO AND REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CARAWAY. On page 4962 of the RECORD of yesterday, April 4, appear the proceedings in reference to a resolution submitted by me. I asked permission to submit a resolution out of order, and then asked also that it might be read. Now, here is what happened——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair may be permitted to interrupt the Senator, he desires to say that he is familiar with the RECORD on that point, and the present occupant of the chair is of the opinion that the resolution was offered by the Senator from Arkansas, and it will be laid before the Senate in its order.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR POMERENE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] delivered a very able address on Thursday evening, March 30, 1922, before the Cleveland Association of Credit Men on the subject of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence River improvement. It is an address which carries a great deal of meat in it, explaining the whole situation, and I think it is worthy of being printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD in the regular RECORD type.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

SPEECH OF SENATOR ATLEE POMERENE BEFORE THE CLEVELAND ASSOCIATION OF CREDIT MEN, CLEVELAND, OHIO, THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 30, 1922.

THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence River improvement has two phases—one political, one economical.

When I speak of the political phase I do not have reference to our domestic partisan questions, but to the relations which the United States and Canada, as sovereign peoples, sustain to one another.

When I speak of the economical phase I use the term in its broadest acceptation. It includes not only navigation, but if we would get the maximum returns from this enterprise we must also take into consideration the tremendous possibilities in developing hydroelectric power—the cheapest power thus far known to man.

That we already have the political or legal right to navigate the St. Lawrence River upon the same terms and conditions as the nationals of the Dominion Government is evident to anyone who will examine the treaties.

TREATY RIGHTS IN THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

By article 7 of the Webster-Ashburton treaty (1842) it was agreed that the channels in the River St. Lawrence on both sides of the Long Sault Islands and of Barnhart Islands, and so forth, "shall be equally free and open to the ships, vessels, and boats of both parties."

By article 26 of the treaty of Washington (1871) the "navigation of the River St. Lawrence, ascending and descending from the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude, where it ceases to form the boundary between the two countries, from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of Great Britain or of the Dominion of Canada not inconsistent with such privileges of free navigation."

By article 27 of the same treaty the British Government engaged to urge upon the Dominion Government to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

In 1905 the Dominion abandoned the system of canal tolls, since which time all Canadian canals have been free to all vessels with their cargoes or passengers, whether these were Canadian or American.

By article 1 of the treaty of January 11, 1909, Great Britain and the United States agreed that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters between the United States and Canada "shall forever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally, subject, however, to any laws and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privileges of free navigation and applying equally and without discrimination to the inhabitants, ships, vessels, and boats of both countries."

At the time of the ratification of these treaties no definite plan had been adopted, or is yet adopted, looking to the method of improving the river or of the proportion of the expense which should be borne by each of the two Governments. It necessarily follows that the first step after the determination of the practicability of the venture is to study the method by which the work is to be done, by which it is to be financed, and by which it is to be administered during the process of construction and in its maintenance thereafter.

I have such supreme faith in the spirit of fair dealing which always has inspired the people of the United States and our Canadian neighbors that I am quite sure but little difficulty is to be apprehended in this behalf. Write it down for all time, and without any reservation whatsoever, that what will redound to the benefit of the one nation in its transportation system will be of a proportional benefit to the people of the other nation.

I have heard it said that this great enterprise for the development of the middle continent and its commerce must not be undertaken because, while a portion of the route is along that part of the St. Lawrence River which forms the international boundary between the two nations, another extensive portion of the route lies wholly within the Dominion of Canada.

I can not agree with this position. I think it captious. Will the gentlemen who are disposed to hesitate because of this condition pardon me if I say to them that I think they are "seeing things at night"?

I recall with great pleasure and greater pride that these two great virile people who have accomplished so much in the past, and give greater promise for the future, have lived and wrought along a boundary line which is nearly 4,000 miles in length, at peace with one another for more than 100 years, without a fort or a soldier to police the boundary. And if anyone were to rise in the Halls of Congress at Washington or in the Parliament at Ottawa and suggest the organization and maintenance of a military force to police this boundary line, he would be hooted down by his associates. I have no more fear of trouble between the United States and Canada than I have of trouble between the citizens of Ohio and the citizens of Pennsylvania, and I am quite sure our Canadian friends across the boundary, on the other side of the Lakes, have no more fear of serious difficulty between the United States and Canada than they fear aggressions between the peoples of two of their great Provinces.

To be more specific, I have heard it suggested that if the St. Lawrence route was canalized and deepened, warships, it might be, of Great Britain or some other country, could wend their way up the St. Lawrence River into the Great Lakes and attack our great cities. I would lose faith in humanity itself and in the onward progress of civilization if I were to take counsel of such groundless fears in weighing a great enterprise of this character which will mean so much to the development of our two great countries.

Let us then in the consideration of this subject, assuming, of course, that the enterprise is regarded by investigators as practicable, suggest that the two Governments, either through their respective Departments of State or Foreign Affairs, or through commissioners specially appointed for that purpose, negotiate a treaty or convention by the terms of which the two countries shall agree to undertake the construction, the financing, and the maintenance of this channel from the unsalted to the salted seas.

Surely there will be no disposition upon the part of our Government to take any undue advantage of our Canadian friends, and I am quite confident that they will approach the subject in the same spirit.

THE ECONOMICAL SIDE OF THE PROBLEM.

Let us devote ourselves to-night rather to the economical side of the problem.

Forty-two million people in the United States are found in the States directly tributary to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route, and there are nearly five million in the Provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan.

Sixty-three and three-tenths per cent of the aggregate value of all of the farm property in the United States is within this territory.

In this territory is produced 75 per cent of the wheat, 65 per cent of the corn, 100 per cent of the flax, 85 per cent of the iron, 40 per cent of the copper, 46 per cent of the lead, and 74 per cent of the zinc.

The report of the International Joint Commission, page 107, shows that out of 2,973,890 square miles of land surface in the United States, 1,232,645 square miles, or 41.5 per cent of the total, lies in the area tributary to the proposed waterway.

The value of the farm lands in this area is $49,319,331,000, as against $79,925,989,000, or 63.3 per cent of the total value.

It embraces, too, many of the great manufacturing industries of the country, producing agricultural implements, automobiles, rubber manufactures, meat packing, and all sorts of iron, steel, paper, and furniture products.

It is estimated by the commission that the average savings on grain through the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route will amount to from 8 to 10 cents a bushel on all grain exported, as compared with traffic prices now prevailing through lake and rail, or all rail hauls. But let me be a little more specific.

At the present time it is somewhat difficult to ascertain exactly what the traffic rates might be for wheat or grain from the upper lake region through the St. Lawrence to European ports. Certainly it is one rate under present conditions. It would be a much lower rate were the channel completed for ocean traffic. I am entirely clear in my own mind that it will result in very substantial savings.

Mr. Charles F. MacDonald, of the Duluth Board of Trade, told the International Joint Commission that the lake rate on grain from Duluth to Buffalo at the present time was 4 cents a bushel, and the transportation from Duluth to New York, including lake and rail rates, with insurance and incidentals, was about 15¼ cents a bushel, delivered in New York, but not on board vessel. The all-rail rate from Duluth to New York was 20.7 cents. With the present channels on the all-water route to Montreal there is little movement of grain. With deeper channels accommodating larger vessels, in his judgment, the movement would be greatly increased and the rate to Montreal would be about 11 cents.

Hugh J. Hughes, market director of the Minnesota Department of Agriculture, figured the cost of transporting a bushel of wheat from Duluth to Buffalo at 2¼ cents. At Buffalo the transfer charges from boat to rail were approximately three-fourths of 1 cent. The rail haul from Buffalo to New York amounted to 4 cents.

The cost of transfer from car to ship in New York, three-tenths of 1 cent. Freight charges under normal conditions from New York to Liverpool were 5¼ cents, making a total transportation charge from Duluth to Liverpool of 12.55 cents. Deducting the three items involving transfer and rail haul, amounting to 5.05 of 1 cent, there was left a total water haul of 7½ cents. In other words, fully one-half of the transportation charges from the terminals at Duluth to the warehouses in Liverpool were taken up by an overland portage that left the bushel of wheat when in New York Harbor farther away from its point of destination than when it left the ship at Buffalo. In his judgment the construction of a deep waterway from Duluth to the sea would result in a saving to the shipper of an amount equal to the cost of transportation from the lake boat at Buffalo to the ocean-going ship at New York.

Julius H. Barnes, than whom no man is better informed relative to the shipment of grain, says: "If the St. Lawrence waterway were opened so that either lake carrier would extend its trip down to Montreal or the ocean carrier go up to the head of the Lakes for its cargo, the transportation saving would amount to perhaps 10 cents a bushel." Surely this sum would be saved to the farmer on wheat actually transported to Liverpool, and this cheaper marketing would be reflected in a somewhat better price for the balance of his crop.

The Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Herbert Hoover, put the problem thus: "It is a sound economic assumption that the price of all agricultural produce was made at the points in the world where that produce must meet the tide and flow of similar produce from other quarters of the earth. In other words, the price to the farmer would be increased by whatever saving might be made in transporting and handling up to the point where his price was fixed by the flow of world current." He then adds: "If by the construction of the proposed canal it was possible to secure navigation of ocean-going ships on the Lakes or even of lake carriers to Montreal in a period of two or three days, it was not difficult to calculate that the transportation of wheat from Buffalo to Montreal would not exceed 1 cent a bushel or perhaps 2 cents. Putting it at 2 cents at the outside, there would be a saving of approximately 10 cents a bushel to the American farmer on his wheat reaching Liverpool."

At the time the commission held hearings in Buffalo the rate for the shipment of grain from the head of the Lakes to Buffalo was 4 cents a bushel, or about $1.20 a ton. From Buffalo to New York, including transfer and loading into the vessel's hold, $3.20 a ton. If the Lakes-to-ocean route is completed the voyage could be continued to Montreal for perhaps 3 cents a bushel, or 90 cents a ton. From Montreal the ocean rate is ordinarily equal to the rate from New York. So it would seem that the rate from Buffalo to Montreal would amount to about 90 cents a ton, whereas from Buffalo to New York, including transfer, and so forth, it would be $3.20, or a saving of $2.30 per ton. The ocean rates from Montreal to Great Britain are about the same as they are from New York to the British ports. Those who have studied the problem are very certain that there can be a saving to the farmers of from 7 to 10 cents a bushel in the transportation abroad when the St. Lawrence is completed.

Governor Harding, of Iowa, testifying before the International Joint Commission, says that a bushel of wheat can be shipped from Duluth to Buffalo for 2 cents; from Buffalo to the ocean-going boats for 17 cents; and from the ocean-going boats to Liverpool for 14 cents. This is the present method.

With the St. Lawrence canal a bushel of wheat could be shipped from Duluth to Montreal for 3 cents, and from Montreal to Liverpool for 12 cents. The difference of 12 or 18 cents in transportation cost could go into the pockets of the American farmer.

I might quote from other expert witnesses on this subject, but time forbids. Suffice it to say that it is my judgment after a careful study of this proposition that if this Great Lakes-St. Lawrence water route is completed so as to permit of ocean-going vessels moving from the ports of the Great Lakes to the ports of the Old World to market our wheat there will be a saving of from 5 to 10 cents a bushel, thereby increasing the price to that extent to the producer.

It will be noticed that the figures I give vary. This is due in part to the fact that they are based partly on estimates and partly because they are based on various rates prevailing at different times.

Similar savings would result in many other classes of traffic, whether of agriculture or manufactures.

INCREASE IN LAKE TRAFFIC.

The increase in lake traffic has kept pace with the improvement of her harbors, docks, and channels. It has grown by leaps and bounds. This is due in part to the increased production in midcontinent, and in part to the great ability, energy, and foresight of the Great Lakes marine service.

Before the Federal Government began to improve the Great Lakes, Lake Erie had no harbor extending in depth more than 5 feet, and a few harbors extending that depth in the other lakes. In 1824 improvements were first begun by the Federal Government. Between that date and June 30, 1918, $150,000,000 were spent by the Federal Government on channels, harbors, and rivers connected with this system of lakes. Now 27 harbors in these lakes will admit vessels drawing 19 to 21 feet, and 45 harbors of less importance admit vessels drawing 14 feet. Now the traffic from Lake Erie to Montreal is limited to vessels drawing 14 feet, that being the depth of the Welland Canal.

Iron ore was discovered in the Lake Superior region in 1844.

In 1855 there were 5,000 tons shipped in sailing vessels from the Lake Superior region to Cleveland.

Further discoveries and development tremendously increased this output.

In 1884, 68,000 tons were shipped.

Three years later this amount jumped to 400,000 tons.

In 1920 the iron-ore tonnage increased to 56,780,498 tons.

The total value of the iron ore shipped by water from Lake Superior increased from $8,741,955.87 in 1887 to $340,682,988 in 1920.

Coal shipments from Lake Erie ports to the upper Lakes over the same period increased from $4,735,454 in 1887 to $119,427,870 in 1920.

The tonnage of hard and soft coal for the last year was 14,156,259 tons.

GRAIN SHIPMENTS.

The first record of wheat shipments through the canal at Sault Ste. Marie was in 1870. The amount was 49,700 bushels.

Forty-five years later 255,481,558 bushels were shipped east by the same water route.

The total for 1920 was 143,456,487 bushels.

In 1870 the shipments of grain other than wheat aggregated 304,077 bushels.

In 1920, 51,630,135 bushels.

In 1870, 33,548 barrels of flour went through the canal.

In 1920, 7,477,533 barrels.

In 1920, $1,000,000,000 worth of freight was carried through the canal at Sault Ste. Marie. This amount is distributed as follows:

Coal	$119,000,000
Flour	86,000,000
Wheat	315,000,000
Other grain	78,000,000
Manufactured iron	6,000,000
Copper	18,000,000
Iron ore	340,000,000
Lumber	10,000,000
Stone	985,000
Salt	992,000
General merchandise	125,000,000

The total value of the freight through the canal increased from $79,000,000 in 1887 to $1,119,000,000 in 1920.

In 1855 the tonnage shipped through the canals at Sault Ste. Marie was 14,500 tons.

In 1920, 79,282,000 tons.

Four years earlier the tonnage was 92,000,000 tons.

And, now, before we dismiss this branch of our subject, let me ask, Does anyone seriously believe that we have reached the peak of production in the country tributary to the Great Lakes? In Indiana is located the center of our population. A little farther west is the center of agricultural production. Here in northeastern Ohio is the center of industrial development. Three of the five largest cities on the American Continent are on the Lakes—Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland.

Shall we believe that any one of these industrial centers, to say nothing of the many splendid lesser cities which dot the shores of the Great Lakes, have reached the limit of their growth or industrial activities? To even suggest the thought would offend our intelligence. The Middle West has not completed its growth. It is just beginning to grow and to feel its giant strength. Great things we have accomplished in the past. Greater things are in store for us. We must prepare for the future. Not the least of the tasks before us is to provide ourselves with the transportation facilities that may be necessary to accommodate not only the present traffic but the increased traffic for future years.

PRESENT RAIL AND RAIL-WATER TRANSPORTATION.

I think every student of our transportation system must admit that present rail and rail-water facilities are not keeping apace with the needs of the country.

Transportation, like production, ebbs and flows. Disturbed economic conditions will come in spite of all that human ingenuity can devise, but as sure as they come, so they will go. The progress of events is onward. New conditions must be met. It is estimated that at least one billion if not two billions a year should be added to the rail equipment in order to be able to accommodate the traffic which will come with returning good times, and this must continue for many years. But let us not deceive ourselves. Common prudence suggests that we ought not to spend two billion where one will suffice. Common sense admits that if certain routes of traffic are already congested, we ought to see other outlets, if they are practicable.

The points of greatest congestion now are New York City and New England. We know now as the result of very sad experiences during the war, if we did not know it before, that New York terminal facilities are wholly inadequate to meet the demands. I do not overlook the fact that these demands were made greatly excessive due to the conditions of the war, but to a very material, though a lesser, extent they did exist before the World War came.

The cost of handling traffic in New York is not going to be lessened by increasing traffic in this terminal. New York City and New York State will have their annual increases. Their shipping point will be New York City, as it ought to be, and if they improve their harbor and dock facilities sufficiently to keep apace with their own economic development, they will be doing well.

But shall the vast agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of the Middle West and the Northwest, to say nothing of Canada, await the development of proper facilities in New York City?

I entertain none but the best of good will toward the great Empire State and the metropolitan city of New York, but if that city is not able to accommodate, as it has not been for years, the outgoing and incoming commerce of the great Central West, who is it that says we must be hampered in our development by its lack of capacity?

In speaking of the failure of New York to serve the commerce of the Middle West and his efforts to get cars for the shipment of wheat, Governor Allen, of Kansas, related this significant statement which had been made to him: "When you start a carload of grain from Chicago to New York and it reaches Trenton, N. J., it is only half way so far as time is concerned, and not one-half way yet so far as future expense is concerned." This may be a somewhat extravagant statement, but it epitomizes the experience of the great central and northwestern section of our country.

Mr. E. A. Kersten, of the S. S. Kresge Co., of Detroit, with a business aggregating over fifty millions a year, and a large part of whose sales are of imported articles, says, "That the average time consumed in getting merchandise from Europe or Japan through the port of New York to Detroit was four months, one month of which was used in the port of New York."

C. T. Bradford, of the International Harvester Co., said to the International Joint Commission that it was not at all unusual for goods to be from 60 to 75 days from date of shipment from Chicago to date of clearing from New York.

Mr. Carl W. Brand, of Cleveland, said "that delays in getting shipments through New York had resulted in importers having to carry a much larger investment in their business. In some cases the cost of handling goods through New York amounted to 20 per cent of the first cost."

Walter L. Ross, with a railroad experience of 30 years, said "he had been convinced that the primary cause of most of the transportation difficulties was congestion in New England and New York. In his judgment, the waterway project through the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River would relieve New York and New England and Maryland ports very materially, and thereby make for efficiency in transportation all over the country."

I dare say that the merchants and manufacturers of Cleveland and of the great State of Ohio can duplicate these experiences.

New York has talked for years about the expenditure of from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 in improvements in New York Harbor. A prominent railroad executive is my authority for the statement that the transportation of the country, estimated in ton-miles, doubles every 10 years. If this statement is only approximately true, I am convinced that before New York City or the Government at Washington could spend the $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 in improving New York Harbor the annual increase of traffic in that city would be so great that even with these contemplated improvements completed the congestion would be as great then as it is now.

EXPENSE OF TRAFFIC IN NEW YORK HARBOR.

The Port Facilities Commission of the United States Shipping Board has gone into the question of the charges borne by steamship companies at New York. They find that the actual physical loading of the vessel was not the great source of loss and expense to-day, but rather the time the vessel was held in port. The case was cited of a small steamer of 6,500 dead-weight tons which was 15 days in port discharging 2,713 tons and loading 3,783 tons of general cargo. The port pay roll, supplies, interest, depreciation, hull, marine, and other insurance, charter hire, etc., amounted to $42,286. Other expenses, such as wharfage, pilotage, and the various stevedoring accounts amounted to $23,385, altogether $65,671, or an average of $4,371 a day. Hamburg, Rotterdam, and a few other of the efficient ports of Europe could easily have dispatched this vessel in five days before the war. On that basis the delays were costing nearly $5 a ton to the ship. Of course, this is no doubt an extreme case.

It may be said, as was urged before the commission, that the delays in New York Harbor were due to the failure of the New York authorities or of the Congress in furnishing funds for the necessary improvements. That may be true either in whole or in part, but the question now for us to determine is, keeping in mind not only the present demands but the future development of our country and the tremendous increases in outgoing and incoming freight to supply the needs of the interior of the continent, "Shall we make these expenditures in one harbor, which perhaps can not be developed sufficiently to take care of its annual increases, rather than to go to the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route, which for all time to come can bring the ocean-going vessels through its channel to the Great Lakes ports, such as Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, and Duluth, to say nothing of the smaller but none the less important lake ports on both the American and Canadian side?"

PRACTICABILITY AND COST OF IMPROVEMENT.

Perhaps the strongest opponent of this Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route is Governor Miller, of New York. He is a great lawyer, whose vision seems to be limited to the boundaries of his own State. He seems to think that the scheme is not practicable and that it will cost too much. Governor Allen, of Kansas, after listening to the argument of Governor Miller, asked him somewhat facetiously, but pertinently, "Are you against the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence improvement because it will not work or because it will work?" With all due respect to Governor Miller he pleads like a skilled advocate who lacks confidence in his case. Others follow him with equally untenable objections.

One objection made is that in the St. Lawrence River traffic must be suspended for a period of five months during the winter because of the ice and the fog.

True, these are obstacles, but those who emphasize them forget that the same fog and ice for five months interferes with the ocean-going traffic to and from the great city of Montreal, through the lower St. Lawrence River, and yet her ocean-going traffic is greater than that of any Atlantic port in the United States save and except New York City alone. Two other American ports during the last year, I believe, have slightly exceeded Montreal. When this objection is made they forget that the lake traffic, too, is substantially suspended for four or five months, but nevertheless it is used to such an extent that 100,000,000 tons pass annually through the Detroit River, and it is all the time increasing, and would anyone say that the lake traffic is not a paying venture because ice interferes for four or five months in the year?

Again, they forget that the greatest congestion in rail traffic in the country is during the seven months when neither ice nor fog interferes with the St. Lawrence route.

Another objection urged is that ocean-going vessels will not enter the St. Lawrence. This is not tenable, because—

First, the cost of all rail traffic as compared with all water traffic is estimated as 5 or 6 to 1.

Second, already we have an enormous ocean traffic through the St. Lawrence to and from Montreal, which is perhaps second only to that of New York.

Third, there is a Great Lakes traffic amounting to nearly 100,000,000 tons annually, nearly eleven times as much as passes through the Suez Canal and almost twelve times as much as passes annually through the Panama Canal.

Having these facts in mind, who shall say that if the canalization of the St. Lawrence River from Montreal to Lake Ontario is completed that ocean traffic will not seek to go farther up the river; aye, even to the headwaters of Lake Superior?

Magna Swenson, the owner of the great Norwegian trans-Atlantic lines, has said:

"The moment the engineers who build the canal declare this canal is ready for operation, that moment his steamers would poke their noses into the St. Lawrence."

Certainly, in view of the enormous amount of ocean traffic at Montreal, 700 or 800 miles up the St. Lawrence River, the burden of proof is on those who contend that it will not go up farther to demonstrate the faith that is in them.

PLAN FOR CANALIZATION OF RIVER.

The distance from Lake Ontario to the Atlantic is approximately 1,000 miles. The Gulf of St. Lawrence extends to Quebec, or nearly so. The river is now improved for ocean-going vessels up river as far as Montreal. It is only 183 miles from Montreal to Lake Ontario. Only 33 miles of this distance must be canalized. The remainder of this distance needs little or no improvement, except a little dredging. The flow of water in this river is more nearly constant than in rivers usually. The variation due to seasons is seldom more than 25 per cent either above or below the mean level. For comparison purposes, it is interesting to note that there is a ratio of 30 to 1 between the spring flow and the late summer volume of the Mississippi River at Keokuk.

The engineers, Col. W. P. Wooten, United States Engineer Corps, for the United States, and Mr. W. A. Bowden, chief engineer of railways and canals for Canada, recommended the improvement. For convenience sake they divide the improvement into two sections.

First, the international section, extending from Lake Ontario to Cornwall, or the international boundary line, a distance of about 45 miles. The fall in the river is 91 feet. At present there are four canals on the Canadian side. The plan of the board contemplates the construction of a canal on the Canadian side with a prism depth of 25 feet at low water. This canal extends from the head of Long Sault Rapids down to Cornwall, a distance of 8 miles, and provided with two lift locks, with a depth of 30 feet on the sills. In order to concentrate the fall in the river so as to reduce the number of locks and lessen the mileage of restricted navigation the plans call for a series of dams. The plan is a combined scheme of navigation and water development. These dams will make possible a development of water power estimated at 1,500,000 horsepower. These engineers estimate the total cost of the entire international section, including flooded areas and power houses equipped to deliver one and one-half million horsepower, at $159,000,000. Damages, of course, should be paid to Canada for the four existing canals which will be put out of commission. This amount is not included in the cost as stated, nor for certain charter rights of the New York & Ontario Power Co.

Second, the national section of the river is that section which lies between Cornwall and Montreal, a distance of about 72 miles. The fall in the river is about 134 feet. In this section of the river lie the three rapids, Coteau, Cedars, and Cascades, the first at the outlet of Lake St. Francis, the second 9 miles lower down, and the last at the entrance to Lake St. Louis. A canal is proposed 220 feet wide, with a depth of 25 feet at low water on the south side of the river, a distance of 15 miles. Some dredging will be required in Lake St. Francis and Lake St. Louis. The cost of this improvement is estimater at $93,000,000, not including the putting out of commission of the present existing canals. The depth contemplated under this plan is 25 feet. To get an additional 5 feet in both the international and national sections the estimated increased cost would be $17,000,000.

The estimated annual operating and maintenance cost in connection with this scheme is $2,562,000, of which they charge $1,105,000 to cost of navigation and $1,457,000 to power. These figures do not include interest on investment. The engineering board estimates that 2,260,000 horsepower could be developed on the national section of the river, if this should be thought desirable later, at an estimated cost of $220,000,000.

IMPROVEMENTS SHOULD BE COMPLETED AT AN EARLY DATE.

Think what it will mean to have the Atlantic Ocean brought to the door of the great industrial centers of the Middle West. True, the very large ships will not enter. They are not expected to enter; 70 per cent of the commerce of the world is carried on vessels of 8,000 tons or less.

Major General Black gives some significant testimony to this effect. He says: "That out of 14,513 steamships listed in Lloyd's register for 1918–19, 81.45 per cent had drafts of 25 feet or less and 99.32 per cent drew 30 feet or less, leaving a percentage of sixty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent of vessels having 30 feet draft or over. The average draft of vessels passing through the Panama Canal is only 21 feet, and the Suez Maritime Canal Co. also states that the average draft of the vessels passing through the Suez Canal is a little over 21 feet."

It may prove necessary if this St. Lawrence improvement is completed and ocean vessels enter the Lakes to increase from time to time the depths of channels and of harbors, but what of it? Are we not from time to time increasing the depths of the harbors on the Atlantic and the Pacific and the Gulf, as well as the channels leading to them? Why then should we hesitate to embark upon this enterprise? Those who are most opposed to this improvement speak of the expense, but I have not yet heard them decry expense when they call upon the Congress of the United States for appropriations for their own harbors along the Atlantic.

The engineers who have made a very careful study of this project say that the total expense will not exceed $252,000,000, which will include the necessary equipment for the generation of electricity amounting to 1,500,000 horsepower. Of course, their figures are not as definite as they might be. They went into the subject fully enough to convince them of its practicability. Capable engineers that they are, and not only they but the International Joint Commission, suggest that before "any final decision is reached the report of the board together with such comments, criticisms, and alternative plans as have been filed with the commission should be referred back to the board enlarged by other leading members of the engineering profession, to the end that the whole question be given that further and complete study that its magnitude and importance demand."

I am so convinced of the wisdom of this project that I would be for it even if I knew that it were to cost twice the sum. It can not fail. The present traffic of the United States now requires it, and the future industrial development of our own country as well as of Canada accentuate the need of it.

The commission suggests that that part of the cost of the improvement which may be properly chargeable to navigation shall be in proportion to the benefits which each shall receive. This amount they suggest shall be readjusted periodically.

As to the cost of the power works they recommend that as each of the countries is entitled to half of the available power in the international section of the river the cost of the works necessary solely for the development of that power should be borne equally by each country.

They further recommend that the cost of the navigation works required for the combined use of navigation and power over and above the cost of works necessary for navigation alone should be apportioned equally between the two countries.

As to that part of the navigation works which lies wholly within one country they recommend that they should be maintained and operated by the country in which they are located, and that "navigation works" not lying wholly within one country and not capable of economic and efficient construction, maintenance, and operation within one country as complete and independent units, be maintained and operated by an international board, upon which each country would have equal representation.

These, of course, are merely suggestions which have been thrown out for consideration by the proper authorities of the two countries. All of these questions can be very readily determined by a conference between the two Governments and certainly some equitable plan can be devised which will prove satisfactory to all concerned.

I hope for the speedy completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence River improvement at an early date for the common good of the people of the United States and Canada.

PENSION AND COMPENSATION LEGISLATION.

Mr. FRANCE. I hold in my hand an article written by Mr. Henry P. Janes. It is a very good summary of pension and compensation legislation and it has been suggested that it would make a valuable public document. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for the judgment of that committee upon the propriety of making it a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SCHOOLS FOR AERONAUTICS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which the Secretary will read.

The resolution (S. Res. 266) submitted by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts on the 3d instant was read, as follows:

Whereas immediate and adequate consideration and development of the science of aeronautics is vital to the commercial and industrial expansion and to the protection and prosperity of the United States; and

Whereas the science of aeronautics is recognized by all nations as a dominant factor in relation to transportation facilities and the national defense; and

Whereas many foreign nations, cognizant of the necessity and importance of aircraft, have indicated programs of mail and passenger transportation far superior to the present policy of our Government with reference to the stimulation, maintenance, and advance of aeronautics for all national purposes; and

Whereas aircraft is indispensable for the patrolling and for the protection of our coast and boundaries, and to supplement to a considerable degree naval craft, coast artillery defenses, and other means of protection and defense now maintained by the Army and the Navy; and

Whereas at the Conference for the Limitation of Armament no action was taken to reduce, limit, or control the aircraft of the countries represented, although the development of aircraft had a pronounced effect upon the reduction and limitation of navies; and

Whereas it should be apparent to the most casual observer that a sufficient and properly trained personnel capable of developing, instructing, and directing aeronautics, and available for the national defense, is extremely important; and

Whereas it daily becomes more evident that if the United States is not to be completely outdistanced in the field of aeronautics, and is not therefore to be left defenseless, a separate school of aeronautics should be created and maintained, or separate schools of aeronautics should be established in the United States Military Academy and in the United States Naval Academy: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are directed to report to Congress (1) whether or not it is feasible and advisable to establish a school of aeronautics, to be known as the United States Academy for Aeronautics, with buildings, grounds, and equipment necessary for instructing and training cadets; (2) whether or not it is practicable to use a part of the buildings and grounds of the United States Military Academy and of the United States Naval Academy for separate schools in aeronautics, to the end that young men desirous of qualifying for commissions in the United States Air Service may be appointed as cadets to such separate aeronautical schools in the same manner as cadets are now appointed to qualify for commissions in the United States Army and the United States Navy; and (3) whether or not it is feasible to take over one of the existing navy yards or arsenals for the purpose of converting the same into a Government plant for the development and manufacture of aircraft of various kinds suitable for national, commercial, and defense purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not understand that there is any opposition to this resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that the resolution only calls for information, and therefore there will be no objection, so far as I am concerned, and I think there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADMIRAL SIMS'S STATEMENT AND AMBASSADOR HARVEY'S ADDRESS.

Mr. HARRISON. The clerks at the desk are, I understand, anxious to clear the calendar of sundry matters that have become somewhat out of date. On their suggestion, I move that a resolution I offered some time ago, the resolution (S. Res. 91) requesting the President of the United States to furnish the Senate certain information as to the purported speech of Ambassador Harvey, made at the Pilgrims' Day dinner May 19, 1921, and as to the revocation of the leave of Admiral Sims, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

RECORDS OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN IN THE WORLD WAR.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, on Monday last, during a call of the calendar, the bill (S. 2992) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish certain information for historical purposes to the adjutants general of the several States and the District of Columbia, and making appropriation therefor, was passed. I was not present in the Chamber at that time. The Military Affairs Committee had reported the bill with two amendments striking out a part of the bill in which I was particularly interested. In view of these circumstances, I desire to enter a motion that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and move that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I did not understand to what bill the Senator referred.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not catch the title of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill is one intended to require the Secretary of War to furnish the various States with historical information relating to the troops and the movement of troops in the World War.

Mr. FLETCHER. I recall the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the bill be recalled from the House.

The motion was agreed to.

COTTON EXCHANGE METHODS.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I desire to take just a few moments to state that I hope the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will make a report upon a bill which I introduced some time ago. I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

On April 12, 1921, I introduced a bill to amend the present cotton futures contract law. It was immediately referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. On May 24 of last year I appeared before that committee and made a statement, and then I said I had no further witnesses to produce. The matter has been pending ever since. I have urged the committee and the subcommittee at various times to be kind enough to report the bill. Of course, I would be glad to have a favorable report, but I told them if they did not care to make that, to return the bill without any report, or, if they would not do that, to make an unfavorable report.

I want the matter disposed of by the Senate. I want to be perfectly agreeable to all my colleagues, and I have no particular complaint to make against the committee except as to the slowness with which they move. It does seem to me that 12 months is a long enough time to give consideration to the bill, especially when we remember that it took exactly 30 years for Congress to pass the original law on the subject. The hearings on the original law were voluminous and extended over many years, and all the testimony in those hearings is available for the committee in case they care for it. The matter is one of greatest importance to my constituents. In fact, I believe it is of as much importance as all the rest of the laws put together.

I wish to read just a short statement made before the Committee on Agriculture of the House. Some two months ago I went before that committee and they had witnesses there all the way from Houston, Tex., up to New York. They put those witnesses on the stand. One of them was Mr. Bailey C. Harris, president of the Galveston Cotton Exchange, and here is what he had to say:

We have offices in New Orleans and Savannah, and our head office in New York, although we are a southern firm. We have selling offices in Boston, Montreal, Bremen, Germany; Brussels, Belgium; Havre, France; Milan, Italy; and close working arrangements in Spain, in Scandinavia, in England, and in Japan.

Here is a startling statement of Mr. Harris:

Now, I have been in the cotton business about 23 years, 17 years of which time I have been in the business for my own account. Prior to the passage of the Smith-Lever bill, of course, you might say there were no regulations as to the grades or classification or anything else. The New York market was almost constantly used by two or three of the big houses for manipulation purposes, and they were really slaughtering the lambs, both the exporters and the local merchants and everybody.

When the bill was passed to which he refers that cured a great many of the defects of the then custom, but unfortunately it carried the vicious principle of the custom into the law, which law permits the seller of the contract to deliver all of the contract in any 1 of 10 grades instead of 32 grades under the custom. That is where they have kept slaughtering the lambs and everybody else ever since.

I hold in my hand an editorial from the Southern Textile Bulletin, of Charlotte, N. C., of March 16, 1922, which says, amongst other things:

More than 98 per cent of those, other than members, who have bought or sold contracts upon the New York Cotton Exchange have lost money, and the appearance of the New York Cotton Exchange in the rôle of protector of those who trade upon the American Cotton Exchange instead of with them is laughable.

Mr. President, I have no more love for the American Cotton Exchange than I have for the New York Cotton Exchange.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator filed a motion to discharge the committee?

Mr. DIAL. No; I do not care to do that at present. I am merely going to say that I hope the report will be made by next week; if not, at that time I shall ask the cooperation of the Senator from Nebraska, if he will be kind enough to render it.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator that I think his statement is correct, and that the bill introduced by him is entitled to a consideration which it has not received at the hands of the committee. The Senator's bill was referred to a subcommittee, and it has been delayed by methods which, so far as I know, are all right. It is still pending before the subcommittee, and the delay against which the Senator has been protesting has occurred. I think the matter has been delayed too long. I have already told the Senator in conversation with him that if he should file a motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill and to have the bill placed on the calendar, I would not oppose it; that, in fact, I would vote for it, unless on argument I should be convinced otherwise, because it seems to me that, regardless of whether we agree with the Senator or not as to the bill which he has introduced, he is entitled to more prompt consideration of the bill than he has received.

It is not really the fault of the Committee on Agriculture that the bill has been delayed, as the Senator from South Carolina knows. A majority of the subcommittee, I think, are Senators from the South, who are members of the Senator's own party.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator from South Carolina will permit me, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska, who is on the subcommittee, to which he refers?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is the chairman of the subcommittee, but he is not now present.

Mr. DIAL. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is the chairman of the committee, and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], and my colleague, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], are also members of the subcommittee.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the colleague of the Senator from South Carolina is opposed to the bill of the junior Senator from South Carolina. The senior Senator from South Carolina, who is a cotton expert, is a member of the subcommittee. The senior Senator from South Carolina has been sick a part of the time, and it has been on his account, to some extent, that the delay has taken place.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the senior Senator from South Carolina is yet sick.

Mr. NORRIS. I think he is.

I want to say to the junior Senator from South Carolina that if the motion were pending now I should not want the Senate to pass upon it at present; but, under the rule, such a motion has to lie over a day, anyway. I repeat, I myself think there has been unnecessary delay in the matter, but in large part the delay has come about in a way that casts no reflection or blame upon anybody. If, however, the Senator desires to make a motion to discharge the committee, he may do so. I think, however, that this matter should come up on a day when the chairman of the subcommittee may be here, and I think it ought to be taken up when the Senator's colleague also can be present, when the matter may be fought out.

Mr. DIAL. I appreciate very much the fairness of the Senator from Nebraska, and I was satisfied his attitude was as he has stated it. Of course, I wish to disclaim any intention whatever of reflecting upon the subcommittee, which has charge of the bill. My only complaint is the unnecessary delay. When I have anything to do I like to move along and have it disposed of, either one way or the other.

As to my colleague being opposed to the bill, I rather think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is mistaken about that. I think he wants to propose some amendments to the bill, but I do not know that he is opposed to the principle of the legislation which I have proposed. However, he has a right to his view, and I have a right to mine.

I desire to insert in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, an extract from the Southern Textile Bulletin which I have marked. It is very short.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE METHODS.

About two years ago a squeeze was being conducted in New York and southern cotton dealers who were caught on the short side made haste to ship cotton from Norfolk and Savannah, but when the cotton reached New York they found that members of the New York Cotton Exchange had rented every lighter or means of landing the cotton and had rented all available warehouse space, although they had no need of the lighters or the warehouse space.

The southern cotton dealers had to settle at enormous premiums with those who had conducted the "squeeze" and within five minutes after the forced settlement the quotation on the squeezed month dropped 5 cents per pound.

The members whose piety forces them to attempt to save the man who buys 10 bales upon the American Cotton Exchange made no objection when such cutthroat methods as above stated were used by their members to rob southern cotton dealers of 5 cents per pound on a large volume of short cotton.

In 1914 Lewis W. Parker, one of the ablest cotton manufacturers the South ever produced, bought a large amount of cotton futures for his mills, and those on the inside of the New York Cotton Exchange manipulated the market to depress the month that he had bought.

Facing a severe loss by reason of the undue depression of that month, Mr. Parker decided to take up the cotton—that is, to call for delivery.

His action at first threw consternation into the exchange, but they put into effect every bit of red tape and every technicality at their disposal and when he finally got his cotton most of it was of almost unspinnable grades. They had also cornered all the cotton warehouse space in New York and Brooklyn so as to put him to additional expense of shipping the cotton elsewhere. Lewis W. Parker paid a large price for his temerity in accepting cotton upon New York Cotton Exchange contracts.

We have told only a few of the things that they did to him, but there are men who were associated with him at that time that can tell a tale worth hearing.

We do not want to see the New York Cotton Exchange put out of business, and we know that there are many honest men among its members, but they should purge themselves before they seek to remove the mote from their younger brother's eye.

Mr. DIAL. Furthermore, Mr. President, I desire to say that I have introduced a resolution, which has passed the Senate, requesting the Federal Trade Commission to investigate cotton exchanges. The passage of that resolution need not interfere at all with the particular bill which I have introduced. There are many things about the cotton exchanges which I desire to have investigated; but I have not the least shadow of a doubt about the justice of my bill and about its sufficiency in affording great relief to our people should it be passed. In fact, unless we have some legislation to help the cause of cotton production, it will not be more than a year or two until we shall have to offer a premium to get people to raise cotton in the United States. There is now the darkest outlook for a crop of cotton which I have even known in my lifetime.

Mr. President, I hope the subcommittee having charge of my bill will speedily make its report. It will be a year next week since the bill was introduced. If the subcommittee can not see its way clear to make a report next week, I shall then move that it be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be placed on the calendar. Congress is unconsciously aiding the cotton bears every hour it allows the present law to remain unamended.

My amendment does not interfere with the 10 tenderable grades; it only classifies them in three classes—A, B, and C, with a basic grade in each class. This is similar to wheat. This amendment will make a contract flexible enough for anyone to trade in, and definite enough to make it worth what it is claimed to represent, thereby the buyer and seller will be on equal terms, and unquestionably the value of the commodity will be enhanced.

BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The reading clerk read Senate Resolution 267, submitted by Mr. CARAWAY on the 3d instant, as follows:

Whereas without notice as required by law, and without warning, the President of the United States, under an Executive order issued Friday, March 31, 1922, dismissed James L. Wilmeth, Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and 31 other chiefs of divisions of that bureau; and

Whereas all of said persons were within the classified service; and

Whereas the law permits the dismissal of persons within the classified service only after written notice of and an opportunity to reply to charges should be given the accused: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public good, (a) what facts warranted the dismissal of the men mentioned from the classified service; (b) on what authority and by what authority he dismissed these employees from the service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ASHURST obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I simply want to give notice that unless the Senator will strike out the "whereases" I shall move to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

Mr. KING. What are the words that the Senator asks to have stricken out?

Mr. CURTIS. The "whereases." If the "whereases" are stricken out, I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, to my mind a more serious question than the "whereases" is involved. As I understand, this is a resolution asking the President of the United States to inform the Senate why he dismissed somebody from office.

Mr. CURTIS. If not incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. BORAH. Even if the public interest is not involved, there is the legal question as to whether or not Congress has a right to ask the President how he shall discharge his duties under his executive authority with reference to officers. I think it involves a very serious legal question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, if there is a law which inhibits the President of the United States—I am assuming that—from removing employees of the Government without cause, certainly the Senator from Idaho would not contend that it was improper for Congress to institute an inquiry.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if the President of the United States has violated a law which we had a right to pass, there is a way to reach it.

Mr. KING. That could be done by impeachment, as they attempted to impeach Andrew Johnson for an alleged improper removal of one of his Cabinet officers.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; or a committee could be appointed to investigate; but I simply desire to say that I think the most important proposition involved in it is that of the right of the Congress to ask the President with reference to why he dismissed some man from office. That is a matter which was once discussed very thoroughly before Congress, and on which a Democratic President, if I remember correctly, advised the Congress that it was none of their business, or words to that effect.

Mr. STERLING and Mr. CARAWAY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has the floor. To whom does he yield, if to anyone?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I simply want to suggest to the Senator from Kansas that if this resolution is referred to the Committee on Civil Service, it should be referred preamble and all—the preamble as well as the resolution. The Civil Service Committee might not agree to the form, it might not agree to the preamble, and might make its report accordingly.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator misunderstood me. I said that so far as I was personally concerned, if the "whereases" were stricken from the resolution, I had no objection to the consideration of the resolution; but in view of what has been stated, I shall insist upon my motion that the resolution as a whole go to the Committee on Civil Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kansas and also the Senator from Arkansas a question? There is another resolution here that proposes to have a special committee to investigate the question of the dismissal of these parties. Could we not take that up first, before action is taken on this resolution?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in view of the wording of the resolution, which the Chair has held properly comes before the Senate, I think it should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It could go to the Commitee on Civil Service and then be reported back and go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and when that resolution comes up I shall make the same motion with regard to it that I have made with regard to this one.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if I may be allowed a word, while I am not seeking work for the Civil Service Committee, if it is appropriate that the first resolution—the one introduced by the Senator from Arkansas on day before yesterday—should go to the Civil Service Committee, I think there is additional reason why the second resolution, the one introduced on yesterday, should go to the Civil Service Committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the second resolution should go to two committees—the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, in order to determine the question of expense, and the Committee on Civil Service.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Kansas——

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have no disposition to contend about which committee the resolution shall go to. I am only concerned that we shall finally get a vote upon it.

Mr. CURTIS. Then why not let both resolutions go to the Committee on Civil Service?

Mr. CARAWAY. I would rather, if the Senator from Kansas would agree, that both go, or at least that the second one go, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I only want action on it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the resolution should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, it would likely have to go to the Committee on Civil Service later on; so why not refer both of them there now?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think that necessarily follows. I presume the Senator from Kansas will agree with me that the Senate ought to have a chance to express itself upon these questions.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly I do, but I think they ought to go to the committee first.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am willing to follow the Senator's first suggestion and let the first one go to the Committee on Civil Service and let the other one go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That was the Senator's first suggestion, and I shall not contest the matter if it is so agreed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether he will not incorporate in his motion instructions to the committee to report back within a few days?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no. If the committee does not report within a proper time, of course the Senator from Mississippi can move to discharge the committee. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 269, submitted by Mr. CARAWAY on the 4th instant, as follows:

Whereas pursuant to an order of the President, issued the afternoon of March 31 and immediately effective, there was a wholesale removal of responsible officials of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the appointment of other officials in their stead; and

Whereas the order was made notwithstanding the law, which provides "that no person in the classified civil service of the United States shall be removed therefrom except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of said service and for reasons given in writing, and the person whose removal is sought shall have notice of the same and of any charges preferred against him and be furnished with a copy thereof and also be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing and affidavits in support thereof"; and

Whereas previous to being notified of their sudden dismissal by a letter from the Secretary to the President, accompanied by a copy of the President's order, none of the said persons, so far as they were aware, had been complained of to the Secretary of the Treasury, to whose department the Bureau of Engraving and Printing belongs, or complained of by him, or otherwise made the subject of complaint; and

Whereas the order recites that the action of the President dismissing the said persons was taken "for the good of the service," which carries the implication that the officials removed had been guilty of misconduct, which is a grave injustice to them if, as is alleged to be the fact, they are persons of capacity, character, and experience, who have discharged their duties faithfully and efficiently, some of them being officials whose inventions and improvements have been freely used by the Government to its great advantage, some of them having heretofore declined attractive offers of private employment because of their devotion to the interests of the Government, and some of them being war veterans; and

Whereas it was stated by the press at the time the order was issued that it was approved by the Attorney General, who was then in conference with the President, and it is now similarly stated that the Attorney General will cause an ex parte investigation of conditions in the bureau for the purpose, apparently, of determining whether the order, already executed, was justified by the facts; and

Whereas in view of his recent utterances, which shows that he is hostile to the general policy embodied in the civil service law, such an investigation made and any decision promulgated by the Attorney General would hardly inspire public confidence; and

Whereas it is in every sense proper and desirable that there should be a thorough and impartial inquiry into every feature of the transaction in question; and

Whereas it is also now charged that irregularities amounting to theft have occurred in said bureau; and

Whereas it is in the public press charged that the people were dismissed to prevent those who sought their dismissal from exposing these irregularities; and

Whereas it is charged that a Member of this Senate knew of said irregularities; and

Whereas if said statement in said publications be true, said acts would in fact be a compounding of a felony: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the Senate appoint a committee of five Members, who shall ascertain and report:

The specific facts and reasons upon which the order is based, and by what, if any, real investigation it was preceded; whether the persons removed, or any of them, have failed in the performance of their duties; whether there is ground for believing that the good of the service is likely to be promoted by their removal or by the new appointments; and whether or not the facts indicate that the order may be regarded as a step in the direction of a return to the discredited spoils system by disregarding the spirit and, as is also claimed, the letter of the civil service law. Also find what, if any, basis of fact there is in the story of irregularities charged and the compounding thereof.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY C. WALLACE.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have here a copy of an address delivered by Hon. Henry C. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, at the annual dinner of the Washington Stock Exchange on Saturday night, on the farm-credit needs of this country. It is an exceedingly interesting discussion of the subject, and I am particularly impressed with the reasons given by Secretary Wallace for placing a representative of agriculture on the Federal Reserve Board. The address is short, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ADDRESS BY HENRY C. WALLACE, SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE, BEFORE THE WASHINGTON STOCK EXCHANGE, AT THE NEW WILLARD, APRIL 1, 1922.

FARM-CREDIT NEEDS.

Economic conditions during the past 18 months have directed attention sharply toward the farmer and the important part he plays in our national life. In the fall of 1920 prices of agricultural products almost overnight fell to figures which represented far less than the actual cost of production and far out of line with freight costs, wages, interest, taxes, manufactured goods, and practically everything else which the farmer had to buy. Farmers found themselves under the necessity of practicing the most rigid economy and restricting their buying to the bare necessities. As almost 40 per cent of our population depends directly upon the land for a living, this restricted buying by the farmer very quickly affected our entire industrial and business life. It compelled the slowing down, and in some cases the cessation, of many industries. The inability of so many farmers to pay their debts to the banks when due caused serious trouble and made necessary emergency legislation designed to relieve the tension and ease us through a period of very real financial peril. Many people have been disposed to look upon this emergency legislation, especially such as had to do with financial matters, as of the nature of class legislation solely for the benefit of the farmer. In this they are in error. Bankers and business in general have benefited from it fully as much as have the farmers; indeed, probably more.

As a result of this experience there has been much talk, first, of the need of giving more thought to the effect on agriculture in the administration of our larger credit machinery, and, second, of the need for a better system of agricultural credits. People who deal mainly with evidences of credit and those whose business does not give them an opportunity to know of conditions which influence agricultural production are not unnaturally disposed to regard such suggestions as having for their purpose the securing for the farmer of special privileges and undue advantages over other classes. My purpose this evening is to discuss these matters in their larger phases and try to show that not only should careful thought be taken of the effect on agriculture when administering our larger credit machinery, and not only is there need for a better system of agricultural credits, but that the taking of such thought and the meeting of such need will be to the advantage of the Nation at large and business and industry in general, rather than to the special advantage of the farmer.

To begin with, I advance some general statements which I think may be accepted as truisms. It is to the national interest:

First. That the production of such agricultural products as can be grown successfully in this country should be large enough, one year with another, to meet home needs. In short, that agriculturally the Nation should be self-sustaining.

Second. That so far as possible production should be by landowners or those who are in the way of becoming landowners, and that our system of renting land should be such as to enable the tenants to practice diversification of crops and store and market surplus grain and forage crops in the form of live stock. Only when such conditions obtain can we expect that regard for the maintenance of the fertility of the soil which is our greatest national material asset, and upon which the continued life of the Nation depends.

Third. That inasmuch as almost one-half of all our people live on the land, and the surplus population from the country goes to make up a very important part of our urban life, standards of living on the farm should be maintained and improved rather than lowered.

Fourth. That the farms should yield a fair rate of return on the money invested in land and equipment and a wage to those who work them which is fairly comparable, everything considered, with the wage return in the cities and industrial centers. Otherwise there will be an increasing drift of the better class of farmers to the cities, and in the course of time the land will be worked by people of the peasant type.

Fifth. That inasmuch as profits from the rapid advance in the value of land, which heretofore have been very much larger than the profits from yearly farm operations, are fast disappearing, conditions should be such that in the future our farmers can reasonably count on an adequate return from their farm operations.

Sixth. That hazards, risks, and conditions over which the farmer has no control, but which profoundly influence his returns one year with another—such, for example, as changes in the price level, which throw agricultural prices out of their normal relationship to other prices; weather conditions and insect pests, which greatly affect crop yields—should, so far as possible, be carried by the community at large rather than by the individual farmer.

Seventh. That every proper means should be used to establish agriculture upon a basis which will yield adequate returns for productive effort, rather than put a premium on speculative enterprise.

I take it that there will be general assent to the statements I have just made. It is when measures are proposed which seem necessary to insure the conditions suggested by these statements that differences of opinion arise. There is little difficulty in agreeing upon the ideals which we all wish to attain, but when we consider ways and means there is considerable clashing of views.

Take, for illustration, the proposed amendment to the Federal reserve act. The law now reads that when appointing the five appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board the President "shall have due regard to a fair representation of the different commercial, industrial, and geographic divisions of the country." The proposal is to insert the word "agricultural," so that the law will read that the President "shall have due regard to a fair representation of the different agricultural, commercial, industrial, and geographic divisions of the country." Or, as was suggested by the national agricultural conference held in January, "that in the selection of members of the Federal Reserve Board and the directors of the Federal reserve banks, due representation shall be given to agriculture, merchandizing, and manufacturing, to the end that credit policies may the more surely comprehend the welfare of all basic industries."

These proposals that agriculture, as well as commerce and industry, should be represented on the Federal Reserve Board, grew out of the belief that the needs of agriculture have not had due consideration by the board in determining its general policies, and that, as a result, farmers have suffered severely. Whether or not such belief is justified, certainly policies determined by this board may have a pronounced effect upon prices of agricultural products and upon agricultural credits. It seems to be accepted that commerce and industry and finance should be conceded representation on the board. Agriculture, which is our largest and most important industry, surely can claim a similar place in its own right, and in view of the injurious effect upon commerce and industry in general if policies should be adopted which react unfavorably upon agriculture, the astonishing thing is that anyone should object to such recognition. Such objections probably arise out of the fear that what is meant is that an ignorant partisan, familiar with the practical phases of farming but knowing nothing of financial matters, would be appointed were the law changed as suggested. Such a fear is absurd. The proposed change would simply put agriculture on a par with commerce and industry in the wording of the law, and it is a far-fetched assumption that any President would appoint any man not qualified for the position. In the interests of the country as a whole the membership of this board should be a cross section of our varied industrial life. Its policies so directly affect the welfare of agriculture, business, and industry in general that these policies should not be determined until they have had full consideration by men who have broad understanding of our agricultural, business, and industrial life, using the latter word in its broadest meaning.

A careful examination of the credit facilities of the country leads one to the conclusion that they have been devised almost entirely in the interest of industry and commerce. With the notable exception of the Federal farm loan system, the needs of agriculture have had little attention. I do not mean to suggest that there has been a conscious purpose to develop a credit system to the injury of the farmer, but, rather, that industry, commerce, and business in general have been able to work out and use various credit devices especially adapted to their particular needs, and which the farmer, because of his isolation, of the individualistic character of his business, and of his longer period of turnover, has not been able to use for himself. Having in mind that agriculture is our basic industry, and that it can not be conducted efficiently in the absence of credit facilities suited to its needs, there should be no disagreement with the statement that both long-time and short-time money ought to be as easily and as cheaply available to the farmer as to industry and commerce. The security the farmer has to offer is as good, and the moral risk is fully as low, as with other classes of borrowers.

Heretofore when speaking of the credit needs of the farmer we have been disposed to classify them as long-term or mortgage credit, resting upon real estate as security, and short-term or personal and collateral credit. With the advent of the Federal farm loan system a new and broader conception of farm-mortgage credit has been developed. It is estimated that the total farm-mortgage debt in the United States is about $8,000,000,000. This debt is owing to commercial banks to the amount of approximately $1,500,000,000, to the insurance companies to the amount of perhaps $1,250,000,000, and the remainder to farm-mortgage companies, Federal and joint-stock land banks, various State funds and credit agencies, and individual investors. In well-developed farming sections the interest rate on farm mortgages has been fairly reasonable, although not so low as on other classes of securities no higher in character. In the more recently settled regions the interest rate has been higher than would seem to be justified by the character of the security offered. As a rule farm-mortgage loans run for a period of five years, and are generally made repayable in a lump sum at maturity, although companies which give especial attention to this class of business not infrequently provide for optional yearly payments before maturity.

Under normal conditions it has been possible to renew these mortgages, in whole or in part, upon the payment of a new commission and other incidental expenses, and this has been all the easier because there has been a fairly constant advance in the price of land, thus enhancing the security. However, when such mortgages have fallen due in times of depression or panic, renewals very often of necessity have been denied, and in some cases foreclosure, with consequent loss of the painfully accumulated savings of the farmer.

With the coming of the Federal farm loan system long-time amortized loans were introduced. While this system is hardly past the experimental stage, it promises to remedy many of the difficulties of long-time credit for the farmer. Evidently it has had a helpful effect in reducing interest rates for less-favored agricultural sections. As yet the Federal and joint-stock land banks provide but a relatively small part of the mortgage credit, somewhat less than 7 per cent of the total, but in the Southern and Western States, where interest rates were higher and loans more difficult to obtain, the loans from the Federal system now exceed 10 per cent of the total, and in five of these States exceed 15 per cent.

The most frequently urged objection to the Federal farm-loan system is the tax-exempt privilege of the bonds. I make no argument in favor of tax-exempt securities. I am conscious of the evils and dangers involved in our rapidly increasing volume of such securities, which make it possible for those who have large incomes to shift the tax burden from their own shoulders to those of others less able to bear it, but the Federal farm-loan system is very slightly responsible for the issuance of these tax-exempt securities. While the actual amount of such securities outstanding is not known, it has been estimated by members of the Treasury Department's staff that on January 1, 1922, it was about as follows:

State, county, and minor political subdivisions	$8,142,000,000
United States tax-free bonds (net outstanding)	2,184,000,000
Federal farm-loan bonds (net outstanding)	284,000,000
Bonds of insular possessions (net outstanding)	50,000,000
Total	10,660,000,000

This estimate is below estimates made by various students of taxation, and it makes no allowance for the existence of billions of dollars' worth of semitax-free securities which carry exemptions when held in amounts not exceeding a specified sum. Probably it is not far out of the way to say that we have at least $15,000,000,000 worth of securities upon which no income tax is levied.

In view of the fact that farm tax-exempt securities constitute less than 2 per cent of the whole, such criticism of the Federal farm-loan system is not well taken. It would be to the advantage of the farmer, of the average taxpayer, and of the Government itself, if all tax-exempt securities should be discontinued, but as long as other people are granted such privilege as comes from the issuance of such securities it does not lie in them to protest against similar benefits being extended to the farmer.

Short-time or working credit is secured by the farmer from two sources—the commercial bank and the merchant. Such loans by banks probably aggregate between three and one-half and four billion dollars. It is impossible to estimate the amount of such credit extended by the merchants, but necessarily this also must be carried mostly by the banks. The trouble with such short-time credit as has been available to the farmer is twofold. First, ordinarily the notes given run for a shorter time than he needs the money and therefore must be renewed; and second, except in favored agricultural regions, the interest rate is often higher than farm profits justify the farmer in paying. What the farmer needs is a form of personal credit available for varying lengths of time, according to the purpose for which it is used. It may be called intermediate credit. For the growing of crops credit running from three months to six months is needed; for live-stock growing or feeding the period may run from three months to a year and a half or two years, while for improvement or development purposes, such, for example, as the purchase of certain kinds of machinery, the building of silos and barns, the fencing and draining of land, not infrequently as much as three years' time is needed. Our personal credit machinery, therefore, is not at all adapted to farm requirements. In normal times and in favored regions the farmer can get along fairly well, but in times of financial trouble he is placed at a terrible disadvantage and often is obliged to sacrifice his live stock and grain to the disadvantage not only of himself but of the community at large. For many years past the farmer has been conscious of the disadvantage under which he has labored in this matter of personal credit, but has been unable to help himself. Now, however, due to the economic difficulties of the past two years, bankers and others who have to do with large financial operations, as well as business men whose dealings with farmers are more or less direct, have come to see that the problem is one for them as well as the farmer, and there seems hope of relief.

Two presentations of this matter, both of which have been made recently, are worthy of careful consideration. One is by the Congressional Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, which, after prolonged hearings, last fall made an exceedingly valuable report on credit and has caused the introduction of a bill to amend the Federal farm loan act by establishing a farm credits department in each Federal land bank. In brief, this bill provides that Federal land banks may rediscount notes given for money advanced to farmers for agricultural purposes, such notes having a maturity of not less than six months nor more than three years, these notes to be converted into short-time debentures to be sold to the public in the same way that farm loan bonds are now sold. It is proposed further that such notes shall be eligible for rediscount at any Federal reserve bank when they have reached a maturity of not less than six months; also, the Federal reserve banks would be authorized to buy and sell the debentures issued by the Farm Loan Board, as they now buy and sell farm loan bonds.

The other report was made by the committee on agricultural credit, insurance, and taxation of the National Agricultural Conference. This committee recommended legislation to empower an agency of the Government to discount for banks, trust companies, incorporated live stock associations, and so forth, any note the result of money advanced or used in the first instance for an agricultural purpose; also, to make loans direct to cooperative associations of farmers, such loans to have a maturity of not less than six months nor more than three years at the time they are discounted. Such agency would be authorized to issue or sell debentures with a maturity of not more than three years and Federal reserve banks would be authorized to rediscount for such agency, as well as to buy and sell debentures and other obligations issued by such agency. The committee proposed also that the Federal reserve act be amended to give reserve banks authority to buy and sell notes secured by warehouse receipts covering readily marketable, nonperishable agricultural staples, and also notes secured by live stock.

When it is remembered that among the members of this committee were A. C. Miller, of the Federal Reserve Board; Eugene Meyer, jr., of the War Finance Corporation; Guy Huston, of the Joint Stock Land Bank Association; George Woodruff and Joseph Hirsch, of the American Bankers' Association; A. F. Lever, of the Federal Farm Loan Board; and Theodore H. Price, editor of Commerce and Finance of New York, its recommendations are entitled to the respectful consideration of bankers and financial men generally.

In conclusion, permit me to say that in speaking to you of the need of better agricultural credit it is not with the thought of making a special plea for the farmer or of asking for him special favors to which he is not entitled or advantages over any other class of citizens. The point I have been trying to make is that credit facilities should be provided which are adapted to the peculiar needs of agriculture and thus make it possible for farmers to produce efficiently and abundantly. This is all the more important to our business and industrial life now that we are coming into a period of strenuous competition with foreign manufacturers. Therefore every effort to this end should have the friendly consideration of those who have had training and experience in financial and credit matters.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I have here a synopsis of the proposed adjusted compensation bill, prepared by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], which puts into very concise and easily understandable form the provisions of that bill. I suggest that it would be well to have it printed in the RECORD, for the convenience particularly of service men, and I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SYNOPSIS OF BONUS BILL AS PASSED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, BY SELDEN P. SPENCER, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM MISSOURI.

1. The name of the bill is the World War adjusted compensation act.

It applies to practically every veteran in military and naval forces in the United States between April 5, 1917, and November 12, 1918.

2. It provides for the payment of $1.25 for each day of oversea service, and $1 a day for each day of home service (excluding the first 60 days of service, which was taken care of by the original bonus of $60), with a limit of $625 for oversea service and $500 for home service.

It does not apply to anyone with a grade above that of captain in the Army and its relative rank in the other branches of service.

3. Four optional plans are provided:

a. For adjusted service pay, provided that if the amount coming to the ex-service man is $50 or less, it is payable at once.

b. To receive vocational training aid.

c. To receive farm or home aid.

d. To receive land settlement aid.

The choice must be made by the ex-service man by application to the Secretary of War if he was with the military forces, or to the Secretary of the Navy if he was with the naval forces, and must be made on or before July 1, 1923. Full regulations giving detailed information as to precisely what could be done will be compiled by the War Department and the Navy Department and distributed.

4. No one can interfere by any attachment or levy or any other legal or equitable process with this bonus. It comes from the Government direct to the ex-service man, or if he dies in meantime, to his named beneficiary or estate, nor can the rights under this law be assigned by the ex-service man to anyone else. He must avail himself of it himself.

5. If the ex-service man elects to take an adjusted service certificate, he receives a certificate for the amount due him at the rate of $1 a day or $1.25, as above provided, and in addition for an amount equal to 25 per cent of the actual service compensation, and in addition to this, interest on the full amount at the rate of 4½ per cent compounded annually for 20 years, so that the actual face value of the adjusted service certificate which the ex-service man has is about three times the amount due him at the rate of $1.25 or $1 a day for the time he served, as above indicated.

For example, if a man served 360 days oversea, he would be entitled to $1.25 per day for every day after the first 60 days. This would entitle him to $375. To this amount there would be added 25 per cent of it, or $93.75, and in addition there would be added interest on both amounts at 4½ per cent for 20 years, so that the face value of his certificate would be approximately $1,125.

This certificate is payable in 20 years; that is, on or before September 20, 1942. If the holder should die before this maturity, then the full amount is immediately payable to the person designated by him as his beneficiary, or, failing such designation, to his estate.

If an ex-service man needs any money at any time before September 1, 1925, he can borrow at any State or National bank a half of the amount actually due him for service at the rate per day mentioned above, plus interest on such amount at 4½ per cent compounded annually for the time the certificate has actually run. This loan is based not upon the value of the certificate at maturity but upon the amount due him at the rate per day indicated above, together with interest.

After September 30, 1925, the terms of the loan are more advantageous. A loan then can be made at any post office at 4½ per cent interest. Between October 1, 1925, and October 1, 1928, 85 per cent of the amount actually due for service, plus interest thereon compounded annually, can be borrowed, and as the certificate gets older the borrowing privileges are more and more liberal.

The second choice is vocational aid. To the man who selects this plan there is paid $1.75 for each day he takes vocational training provided for him, but the amount so paid shall not exceed in the aggregate 140 per cent of the amount to which he was entitled for service at the rate per day mentioned above. That is, if a man is entitled to $500 because of his service, he would be entitled to receive $700 if he took vocational training. The vocational training to be selected will be such as the man desires to take and will meet with the approval of the United States Veterans' Bureau. If the man taking vocational training should die before the training is completed, his beneficiary or his estate receives at once the balance due to him.

The third choice is farm or home aid. To the man who selects this plan there is paid at once the amount of his service compensation, computed at the rate per day as indicated above, and to this is added 25 per cent of the amount, but this amount, which becomes at once available, can be used only to enable the man to either make improvements on a city or suburban home or in connection with the farm.

The fourth plan is the land-settlement plan, and provides that the Government shall institute such reclamation projects as a selected board may determine, and when this board has determined what tracts of land shall be reclaimed, then employment, so far as practicable, shall be given in this reclamation work to veterans, and when the project is completed a certain number of acres, which shall not be too large for cultivation by a family and shall be sufficiently large to support the family, shall be allotted to veterans to apply for, and the veteran thus applying therefor shall be allowed to apply on the purchase price of such farm the amount which he is entitled for service as indicated above per day, and to pay the balance of the price of the farm in small installments running, if necessary, through a period of not exceeding 25 years.

If the veteran should die after he has made application for such land, then his beneficiary or his estate would succeed to his rights.

The above is simply a general synopsis of the bill, and is intended to give some idea of what the bill as passed by the House of Representatives provides.

APPOINTMENTS BY EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was under the impression that Senate Resolution 258 was to be handed down by the Chair, but I am informed that it is on the table. I therefore move that Senate Resolution 258 be laid before the Senate and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Mississippi will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read Senate Resolution 258, submitted by Mr. HARRISON on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested to furnish to the Senate the name of every person appointed by Executive order setting aside the civil-service rules, and to furnish to the Senate the reasons therefor.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, if there is no objection, and everyone is in favor of the resolution, I shall not occupy the floor.

Mr. MOSES. With reference to the resolution as it stands, the Senator from Mississippi makes an assumption which is not warranted. Does the Senator mean he wishes the President to send us the name of every person appointed by Executive order since the civil service was first instituted?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I mean since the President assumed the control of the Government.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator means the present President?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I assume this information is sought for the purpose of comparison, and if the resolution is to be adopted, I hope at least it will be amended so as to include the prior administration. I will say, further, for the information of the Senator and for the information of the Senate, that every Executive order setting aside the civil-service regulations and authorizing an appointment is printed in the annual report of the Civil Service Commission, and a full statement of the reasons is given always in the order; so that, in my capacity as chairman of the Committee on Printing, which is charged by the statute to guard against waste and extravagance in public printing, I should hope that the Senator would not ask for this information when he can readily go to the files of the reports of the Civil Service Commission and get it.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very glad to know that it is accessible, and there will be no obstacles thrown in the way. I am not asking for an unusual thing, then, according to what the Senator has said.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator is asking for an unusual thing, because he is asking for a lot of duplicated information to be sent by the President, when a diligent Senator could get it for himself.

Mr. STERLING. In corroboration of what has been stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, I simply call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the last report of the Civil Service Commission, in which is given the list of appointments under Executive orders.

Mr. HARRISON. When was that made?

Mr. STERLING. This is the 1921 report, containing a list of the orders excepting the persons named from the requirements of the rules, and they are given in detail.

Mr. HARRISON. Does that give the reasons for the orders?

Mr. MOSES. Yes; Mr. President, in every case the date of the order and the reasons for it are given. The first order printed here is dated October 2, 1920, and they run down to September 23, 1921.

Mr. HARRISON. That is one of the very reasons, may I say, why I offered this resolution and asked for its immediate consideration. That report gives the list only up to September, 1921, and I want to bring it down to date. It has been some months since then.

Mr. MOSES. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. MOSES. Just what is the status of the resolution? Is the Senator asking unanimous consent for its present consideration?

Mr. HARRISON. It is already before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is on the table, and the Chair understands the Senator from Mississippi has moved to take it from the table and proceed with its consideration. That motion, the Chair understands, has not yet been put.

Mr. MOSES. If I may, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota whether or not that report, or any report which has been made by the Civil Service Commission, will reveal the fact that several hundred employees in the customs service of the Government have been removed or transferred by Executive order, or by some order, largely because, or ostensibly for the reason, that they have opposed the American valuation plan of determining the duties to be imposed upon articles imported into the United States? Has the President or has any executive officer given any information as to the reasons for those changes and transfers?

Mr. MOSES. The question is not addressed to me, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to know whether the Senator from Mississippi has yielded the floor or not?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I have the floor, and I yielded to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. And I propounded an inquiry to my distinguished friend from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. No; it does not. The Civil Service Commission report, under the head of "Executive orders," refers, I think, for the most part, to individual cases. So far as I have scanned that report, it does.

Mr. MOSES. If I may add a word, Mr. President, these orders which are issued are for the purpose of putting people into the classified service without regard to the civil service rules, and an Executive order has to be issued in every case. The Civil Service Commission invariably refuses its assent. That happens under all administrations, Republican and Democratic.

Mr. STERLING. Appointing some originally, or reinstating some?

Mr. MOSES. The Civil Service Commission always withholds its assent, but the Executive always overrides it. However, Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Mississippi will pardon us if we go on talking, because it helps in the general policy of delay which I am sure his record shows he so much desires.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I did not yield to be upbraided in that way.

Mr. MOSES. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not want to upbraid him. I thought I was stating a perfectly patent fact.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not trying to take up time unnecessarily, and I make a point of order against the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to refer the resolution to a committee, because it is not in order. My motion must be put before that would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand that the Senator from Mississippi had yielded the floor for the purpose of allowing another Senator to make a motion to refer the resolution to a committee.

Mr. MOSES. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MOSES. What is the motion now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, the Senator from Mississippi has moved to take from the table Senate Resolution 258.

Mr. MOSES. I move to amend that by adding the words "and refer it to the Committee on Civil Service."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has not yielded for that purpose.

Mr. MOSES. He has made a motion, and I am entitled to move an amendment to his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi was discussing his motion and until he yields the Senator from New Hampshire can not move to amend.

Mr. MOSES. I beg the Senator's pardon; I hope he will go on with his discussion of the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to ask as a parliamentary inquiry if a motion to commit a resolution to a committee does not have precedence?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may have, possibly, when a Senator has an opportunity to make such a motion. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor as yet.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator, if I can get the floor again, for the purpose of allowing him to make his proposed motion, so that we can have the whole thing before the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. I simply ask the Senator from Mississippi to accept the amendment to his motion which I have proposed.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want my resolution buried in that way.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator does not mean "buried." The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the chairman of the committee, will give the resolution every consideration, and very sympathetic consideration, I am sure.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I did not know that there would be any opposition to this resolution, and I am very much surprised. I thought there would be cooperation in trying to obtain this list of names of people who have been appointed by the President since the 4th of March, 1921, by Executive order. The Senator from New Hampshire, who is always alert, and who was yesterday styled a political spoilsman, cites us to this report——

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. I want it to appear very clearly in the RECORD that I am self-styled that way.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator had a pretty good opinion of himself.

Mr. President, the report of the Civil Service Commission does not furnish the information I want. If it did, I would not press this resolution. It only furnishes a list of names of persons appointed under Executive order up to August, 1921. The great number of Executive orders, I understand, have been signed by the President since that time, only when influence has been brought to bear by the distinguished Senator from Illinois and others who sought patronage. So the list I want is not incorporated in this report of the Civil Service Commission. We need it, and we should have it.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Another thing about this report which impresses me as I look over it is that the reasons are not assigned in all cases. They are supposed to be assigned, but they are not assigned in this report. I notice in numerous instances that no reason was assigned for the action. My resolution calls for the reasons as well as for a list of the names.

Now I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. MOSES. I simply wished to ask the Senator if he could not content himself in patience until the next report came out?

Mr. STERLING. May I correct the Senator in regard to his resolution? It does not call for any reasons at all. It just asks for names.

Mr. HARRISON. The resolution I have offered?

Mr. STERLING. I beg the Senator's pardon; I see that it does call for the reasons.

Mr. HARRISON. That is one of the things I wanted, because I thought that in some cases the reasons could not be given. I hope the resolution will be adopted, so that we may be informed as to just how many Executive orders have been issued placing these people in the classified service.

Mr. MOSES. What is the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to take from the table Senate Resolution 258 and proceed with its consideration.

Mr. MOSES. I move to amend that by striking out the words "proceed with its consideration," and add the words "refer it to the Committee on Civil Service."

Mr. HARRISON. I make a point of order against that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will state his point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the point of order that that motion is premature, that the resolution must be before the Senate first, and then if the Senator wants to make his motion he can do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the motion is not amendable. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to know if it would not be in order at this time to move to commit the resolution, and if that would not have precedence over the motion to take it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not before the Senate yet.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KING. I desire to inquire if the resolution is not automatically before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands not. It is still on the table.

Mr. KING. It is my understanding that under the rule it went over yesterday, and to-day automatically came before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been on the table for some time, the Chair understands. It was offered several days ago.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. My point of order is that during the morning hour a motion of this character is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken; but the debate had closed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it in order and permissible at this time for me to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Utah, that the reason why we did not take up the resolution yesterday, when it was presented to the Senate, was because the Senator from Nebraska asked me to let it go over until to-day, and I did so at his instance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to take this resolution from the table and proceed with its consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	Moses	Simmons
Ball	Frelinghuysen	Myers	Spencer
Borah	Gooding	Nelson	Stanley
Broussard	Harreld	New	Sterling

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 258, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NEW (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] and vote "nay." I will let the announcement of this pair and its transfer stand for the day.

Mr. SHIELDS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I understand that he is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained on official business. I ask that this announcement may continue through the day.

Mr. STANLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. STANLEY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and allow my vote to stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington, after having voted in the negative). The Chair desires to state that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent, and I agreed to take care of him for the day. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CALDER. Has the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. CALDER. I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and vote "nay."

Mr. DIAL. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is detained on official business.

Mr. KING (after having voted in the affirmative). May I inquire whether the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. KING. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

So Mr. HARRISON's motion to take from the table Senate Resolution 258 was rejected.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MOSES. The motion which has just been rejected was a motion to take from the table and to consider, was it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was.

Mr. MOSES. A further parliamentary inquiry. Mr. President, would it now be in order for me to move to take the resolution from the table and refer it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, it would be.

Mr. MOSES. Then, I move to take from the table Senate Resolution 258.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Chair will not render an opinion prematurely on the motion. Does the Senator from New Hampshire make the motion?

Mr. MOSES. I am about to make the motion under the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not understand the Chair to make a ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair simply expressed an opinion that the motion suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] would be in order, but the Chair would be perfectly willing to listen to argument on the subject, because the Chair does not claim to be an expert parliamentarian.

Mr. MOSES. Of course, the Senator from Mississippi is, and therefore he will give us his opinion.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I am merely waiting for the motion to be made, and then I shall make a point of order against it.

Mr. MOSES. Then, I move that Senate Resolution 258 be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the point of order that the motion is not in order; that if a resolution or a bill is on the table the only motion which may be properly made is to take it from the table and lay it before the Senate; and that a matter must be before the Senate before it may be referred to a committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the two propositions may be coupled in one motion, and therefore overrules the point of order made by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, I ask for a division of the question, so that the vote may first be taken on the motion to take the resolution from the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks for a division of the motion. The question is, Shall the resolution be taken from the table?

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the part of the motion to take the resolution from the table.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea." On the last vote I inadvertently overlooked the fact that my pair was absent.

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the former vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In view of the necessary absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], with whom I have a general pair, I transfer that pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DIAL. I desire to make the same announcement as to the absence of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] that I made on the former vote. He is necessarily absent on official business.

Mr. SHIELDS. Making the same announcement as previously in reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 64, nays 1, as follows:

So the motion to take Mr. HARRISON's resolution from the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The question recurs on the second part of the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I take it that the resolution is now before the Senate, and therefore I desire to discuss it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CURTIS. The morning hour not having expired, I ask if the motion is debatable?

Mr. HARRISON. It is after 1 o'clock.

Mr. MOSES. But the morning hour has not expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the motion before the Senate was divided; the question was taken on the first part of that motion; and now the question recurs on the second part of the motion. In the opinion of the Chair, the question is not debatable during the morning hour.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does the Presiding Officer hold that the resolution being now before the Senate, a motion made to refer it to the committee is not debatable? I understand the rule specifically states that a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill is not debatable before 1 o'clock; I believe that is the hour stated; but there is nothing in the rule which prevents a Senator from discussing a motion to refer, whether before 1 o'clock or after 1 o'clock. The resolution now being before the Senate, I submit that I have a right now to be heard upon the motion to refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is still of the opinion that the question having arisen in the way it did arise, namely, on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire that the resolution be taken from the table and referred, and then, on request of the Senator from Mississippi that motion being divided, and action having been taken on the first part, the same rule applies to the consideration of the second part of the motion as would apply to the motion if undivided.

Mr. HARRISON. But I desire to offer a substitute for the motion at the proper time, and whether the resolution should be referred or whether we should proceed to its immediate consideration, I submit, Mr. President, a motion to refer is debatable. I do not like to appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, in the case of the Senator's own motion to take from the table and consider his resolution, which was the manner in which he stated his motion, it was held not to be debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. But since then the resolution has been taken from the table and laid before the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. The Senate has acted on one-half of the motion to take from the table and refer.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MOSES. And the Chair has ruled that it all reverts back to the one motion, which is not debatable, having been made prior to 2 o'clock.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An appeal may be taken, of course, but it is the opinion of the Chair that he has ruled correctly on the question now before the Senate. If it were an independent matter brought up at this time, the Chair would be inclined to agree with the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Chair hear me for just a moment, if the Senator from Mississippi will yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that the moment the motion was divided and the segregation occurred, the latter part of the motion would stand exactly in the situation as if it were a motion de novo; as if it were an original proposition. I can not conceive of its being carried back by some sort of a Siamese twin twist of the rule to a situation which existed anterior to the division. As soon as the division occurred and the separation resulted, then the latter part of the proposition stands or falls upon its own merit, the same as if it were an original proposition. I respectfully submit that the distinguished occupant of the chair misconceives the rule and applies it in too narrow a manner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Perhaps the Chair does.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the integral quality of my motion can not be destroyed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Chair that Rule VIII, on page 13 of the Manual, reads as follows:

> At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the calendar of bills and resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, but upon motion the Senate may continue such consideration; and this order shall commence immediately after the call for "concurrent and other resolutions," and shall take precedence of the unfinished business and other special orders. But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter notwithstanding an objection, the foregoing provisions touching debate shall not apply.

Now, here is the point I desire to impress upon the Chair:

> All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.

This is not a motion to proceed to the consideration of any matter. I am going to offer a substitute for the motion to refer the matter to a committee, and I submit that when I do that it can be debated. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a matter can not be debated, but a motion to refer it to a committee certainly should be debated, so that the Senate may be informed whether they shall proceed to the immediate consideration of it or have it go to a committee. I submit that the rule expressly says that it shall not be debated if it is a motion to proceed to the consideration of a matter, and says nothing in the world about a motion with respect to reference.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, has the Senator from Mississippi appealed from the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If Senators will permit the Chair to say just a word, the Senator from Mississippi has read the rule which governs procedure under the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to ask the Senator if he believes that this motion would have been debatable if it had been voted upon as a unit, without having been divided?

Mr. HARRISON. No; in its original form it was not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now, it is divided for the convenience of the Senate, in order that it may vote on each question separately. That is the object of the division. The Chair still is of the opinion that the rule applies to the divided question the same as it did to the original question.

Mr. MOSES. And has the Chair so ruled?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so rules.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Chair will permit me, the question was divided for the reason that all except one Senator wanted to proceed to take the resolution from the table, and they voted that way. We are divided on the question of whether we want to proceed to the immediate consideration of it or refer it to a committee.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MOSES. The Chair having ruled, is the Senator from Mississippi taking an appeal from the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not want to appeal.

Mr. MOSES. Then the Senator is out of order.

Mr. HARRISON. But I move, as a substitute, to proceed to the immediate consideration of this resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a point of order. That motion is out of order. The question is on referring it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the motion that was voted on was to take the resolution from the table and proceed to its consideration. This motion is, since it is before the Senate, to proceed to its consideration; and it is a new proposition, offered as a substitute for the motion to refer it to the committee. We are divided now on that question, and I can not understand why the Senator should make a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will not feel at all embarrassed if the Senator desires to take an appeal, because he does not claim to be an expert on the rules; but the Chair is thoroughly convinced that the only thing in order now is to vote on the second part of the question before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer an amendment to the motion to refer, that the committee be instructed to report to the Senate within three calendar days.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that that is out of order.

Mr. REED. That is in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Would not a motion to refer the resolution to some particular committee be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion was made to refer it to a particular committee. That was the motion before the Senate—to take it from the table and refer it to a particular committee.

Mr. KING. Yes. Now, is not that amendable, I ask, as a parliamentary inquiry? The motion is to refer the resolution to some other committee, and obviously that is amendable. If that motion was proper, then it is proper to instruct the committee named in the first motion to report within a certain time, because it follows under the rule that a motion to refer is proper. It does not mean that you may not move to instruct the committee how to report, or when to report. So I submit that the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi is proper, just as much as it would be if he should move to refer the resolution to some other committee, to the Judiciary Committee or any other committee of the Senate, rather than the one named in the motion.

Mr. HARRISON. We can not hear the argument of the Assistant Secretary in his conversation with the Chair, but I assume that he is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Assistant Secretary advises the Chair at his request as to a point on which the Chair is somewhat in doubt; but in order to solve the doubt the Chair will go contrary to the advice and everything else, and hold that the motion of the Senator is in order, and not debatable. So the question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to amend the motion to refer by instructing the committee to report in three days.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MOSES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	McNary	Shields
Ball	Gooding	Moses	Simmons
Broussard	Harreld	Myers	Smoot
Bursum	Harrison	Nelson	Spencer

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They were ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALDER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence, I transfer my pair with him to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHIELDS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a pair with that Senator, and in his absence I am not at liberty to vote. If I were, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. DIAL. I make the same announcement with reference to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], that he is absent on official business, and ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. BALL (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. BALL. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Ashurst	Kendrick	Reed	Trammell
Broussard	King	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.

So Mr. HARRISON's amendment to the motion to refer was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Instead of referring the resolution to the Committee on Civil Service, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, with instructions that they report to the Senate within three calendar days, and on that I ask for a division.

Mr. CURTIS. A point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that this motion is not in order. It is not in order to move to substitute another committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order, for the reason among other things he has already stated. In this respect the Chair may have been wrong in his former ruling, though he did it as a matter of expedition. This motion now changes the original motion as it came before the Senate, which was to take from the table and refer to a particular committee, and that motion was in order. A division of that question simply gave an opportunity to the Senate to vote on each one of those questions separately. Now, the motion of the Senator changes that proposition entirely.

Mr. HARRISON. The Chair holds, then, that we would have to vote down the motion to refer it to the Committee on Civil Service and then we could vote on the other motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. It may be that some of the Senators present thought that my amendment did not allow sufficient time for the Committee on Civil Service to consider the resolution, just three days. So I move to amend by providing that they shall make a report within six calendar days. I make a point of no quorum.

Mr. MOSES. No business has intervened since the last vote, which disclosed a quorum present in the Chamber.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I submit that the Chair has just sustained a point of order against a motion I made, and that, therefore, business has been transacted. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	Myers	Spencer
Ball	Harreld	Nelson	Stanley
Borah	Harrison	New	Sterling

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have answered to the roll call, and a quorum is present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, were the yeas and nays ordered on this amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They were not.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the Secretary report the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from Mississippi moves to amend the motion by adding the following words:

And that the committee be instructed to report the same back to the Senate within six calendar days.

Mr. STERLING. I make a point of order that any amendment is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled that a similar motion before was in order, and no question was made of the ruling. The question is now on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALDER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], and vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. Not knowing how that Senator would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHIELDS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

So Mr. HARRISON'S amendment to the motion to refer was rejected.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the resolution now goes to the calendar, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask that the pending question be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The pending question is the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the amendment of the committee, in line 22, page 10, to insert before the word "and" the words "for the southern district of Florida, one."

Mr. NELSON obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NELSON. For what purpose does the Senator ask me to yield? I have no objection to yielding if the Senator merely desires to introduce a bill or other paper.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to speak about one matter connected with the pending bill. It will require only a moment.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to yielding if the Senator desires to introduce some paper.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am informed that while I was absent from the Chamber this morning the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], as a matter of courtesy to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST], offered an amendment to the pending bill to restore to the bill a provision for a judge for the middle district of Tennessee. The House bill provided for this judge, and it is the House bill that was reported with amendments and is now being considered. The provision for a judge in the middle Tennessee is immaterial, in the sense that it would be considered by a conference committee, and therefore there is no amendment necessary in order that it may be finally considered.

Tennessee has two Senators in this body and, if I may be allowed to say so, they are both able to take care of the affairs of Tennessee and to provide all necessary judges, and they have introduced and had a bill of that kind passed on two occasions.

I have understood that the junior Senator from Kentucky moved to strike this provision from the House bill in the committee in its last meeting when I was absent on account of illness, and it was so stricken. It is not necessary that it be considered or that any amendment be offered to the bill. What has come over the spirit of the dreams of the junior Senator from Kentucky, what influences have changed his mind, I am not here to state and will not in his absence state any opinion I may have. But I do wish the Senate to know that the two Senators from Tennessee are amply able to take care of proper provisions for the judiciary of their own State.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I simply desire to say that I do not doubt the ability of the two Senators from Tennessee to look after the judicial requirements of that State, but I think the senior Senator from Tennessee knows that I presented the amendment suggested to the bill, providing for a judge for the middle district of Tennessee, at the special instance and request of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST], and on his behalf and out of courtesy to him. The amendment was not offered as an amendment, but I think the RECORD will show that I submitted it as an amendment intended to be proposed at the proper time. I did not know the amendment had been offered.

Mr. SHIELDS. I want it distinctly understood that I was not resenting any action of the Senator from South Dakota, and I thought I had stated that much. If not, I now state that his action in the matter was mere courtesy to the junior Senator from Kentucky and was in no sense an interference with the prerogatives and duties of the Senators from Tennessee.

The provision is in the bill and is one that ought to have stayed in it. Tennessee has one of the ablest district judges in the United States. The Chief Justice went out of his way to say, when he was before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, that Edwin T. Sanford, of Tennessee, was one of the ablest district judges of the United States and was overworked, and in that I agree with him. He is a fine judge, he is an industrious judge, and in the two districts for which he holds court, one of them not having a judge provided by law, he does twice as much business as some of the judges in districts for which assistance is provided, and five times as much as some of those judges.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I propose to take the time of the Senate but for a few moments in discussing the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] proposing to appoint an additional judge for the southern district of Florida. The Senator from Florida on yesterday in his remarks, after adding between 200 and 300 cases to those listed in the report of the Attorney General as pending and undisposed of in the southern district of Florida, kept continually comparing that judicial district with other judicial districts of the country. The fact of the matter is, however, that Florida, with a population of not more than 1,000,000, has two districts, and as a result of the manner in which the State was divided into those districts in 1894 the district court in the northern district of Florida has very little business to transact. Let me read the figures as to the number of cases which were pending there undisposed of on June 30, 1921:

United States civil cases	4
Criminal, including prohibition cases	146
Admiralty cases	26
All other cases	32
Total cases	208

That is the number of cases pending in that district on the date indicated.

As a matter of fact, the judge of that district does not spend, and it is not necessary for him to spend, to exceed two months in the year in his district. He spends most of his time, and he has done so for the last two years, holding court in the State of New York.

The situation in Florida is peculiar in one respect, Mr. President. Some years ago, in 1890, a man by the name of Charles Swayne, from either Delaware or Maryland—there was some question raised in the impeachment case whether he was from one State or the other—was appointed district judge for the northern district of Florida. For some reason, Judge Swayne became very unpopular; and from what transpired in the impeachment proceedings I have reason to believe that there was some ground for his unpopularity. Four years after he had been appointed judge, largely, I presume, because of his unpopularity, most of the territory in the northern district—Swayne's district—was transferred to the southern district; so that out of 61 or 62 counties in the State of Florida, 41 counties were transferred to the southern district of Florida, including nearly all of the long peninsula, as Senators will see if they will examine the map hanging on the wall of the Chamber, from the Georgia line clear down to the coast, embracing all the towns of any consequence except Pensacola on the west; Tallahassee, the capital of the State; and a small town of about 3,000, Apalachicola. All the other towns of any consequence in a wide range of territory were transferred to the southern judicial district. From the best information I could obtain at the time, the transfer was made because of hostility to Judge Swayne.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Minnesota at that point, I desire to state that other important points in the northern district of Florida are Marianna, where there is one term of court held, Madison, Live Oak, Lake City, and Gainesville. Gainesville is far over toward the eastern part of the State. The distance from Gainesville to Pensacola must be 350 miles at least, Pensacola being at the extreme western end of the northern district, while Gainesville is at the eastern end of the district. A term of court is also held at Gainesville.

Mr. NELSON. As I have stated, two-thirds of the territory of Florida was put into the southern district in 1894, four years after Judge Swayne had been appointed. The hostility against him continued, and the delegation from Florida were constantly pressing for his impeachment. They finally succeeded in inducing the House of Representatives to prefer articles of impeachment against him in 1904. Judge Swayne was tried here. There was a large vote against him; my recollection is that on one or more of the articles of impeachment I voted for his conviction; but there was an insufficiency of votes to constitute the two-thirds vote which was necessary to convict him.

Mr. President, it seems to me if Florida would utilize the services of the judge in the northern district, who has little or no work to do, for the work in the southern district, the business could be properly transacted. Adding the number of cases in the two districts together, leaving out draft and bankruptcy cases, there would not be over 1,500 cases for the two judges.

As I have said, the judge of the northern district spends very little time in that district; most of his time being spent in holding court in the State of New York. It may be that the judge in the southern district has a great deal of work, but where there are two districts in a State and one judge has little or no work to do, why can his services not be utilized in the district where there is more work instead of his going outside into other States? If I have the list correctly, it appears that nearly all of the larger towns in Florida are in the southern district, including Jacksonville, with a population of 91,000; Key West, with a population of over 19,000; Miami, with a population of 29,000; Tampa and West Tampa, with a population of 59,000; Palm Beach, with a population of 8,650; St. Augustine, with a population of 14,237; Orlando, with a population of 9,282; and Lakeland, with a population of 7,062. All of those towns are in the southern district, which, as I have said, was carved out of Judge Swayne's district.

As I said a moment ago, the number of towns in what is left of the northern district, comprising the Panhandle, are Apalachicola, with a population of 3,066; Tallahassee, with a population of 5,637; and Pensacola, with a population of 31,000. There are some other smaller towns, but they are not of great consequence.

I have examined the railroad map of Florida and find that the railroad facilities in that State are good. There is a road which runs from Pensacola eastward through Tallahassee, connecting with the great lines running down the east and west coasts. A judge residing in any part of the State will experience no difficulty in reaching any other part where a term of court is to be held. There is even a railroad running to Key West, which is situated away down in the Gulf. There is also a railroad running down the western coast of Florida nearly the whole length of the State, and there are two lines, I believe, on the east coast. There are also lines running across from one of these railroads to the other. Thus the State has good railroad facilities.

Mr. President, to do exact justice in the case of Florida, either one of two things should be done: Either some of the territory now in the southern district should be placed in the northern district, where it really belongs, thus equalizing the districts and making it entirely possible for the two judges to conduct the business of the Federal courts in those districts; or, as has been done in Massachusetts and Minnesota, the State could be made one district and the services of the two judges could be utilized all over the State irrespective of district lines.

Massachusetts, with a population of over 3,000,000, has at present only one district judge, the entire State comprising one district. This bill proposes to add two additional judges to the Massachusetts district, and when the business and the population of that district are compared with others, that does not seem to me to be unreasonable.

The Senator from Florida yesterday made considerable ado about the distances by water around the coast of Florida from one place to another. Mr. President, as I have indicated excellent lines of railroad run there, and it is very easy by means of those railroads for a judge to travel from place to place where terms of court are to be held; he need experience no trouble in that respect whatever.

I imagine that one of the reasons back of the suggestion that an additional judge be provided for the southern district of Florida is that the judge in the northern district is not very well liked and that, therefore, the people of the State desire to secure an additional judge for the southern district.

The Senator from Florida stated that the creation of an additional judge for the southern district of Florida would not involve much expense. Mr. President, the creation of new judges does involve considerable expense, for every time a new judge is appointed there is created a life office. The judge not only receives his full salary while he is in office but he continues to draw that salary for life. It seems to me in the interest of economy—and we all talk economy, but fail oftentimes to enforce it—that no additional judge should be appointed for the southern district of Florida, but that one of two things, as I have indicated, should be done: Either equalize the districts from the standpoint of territory—and that can easily be done, as Senators may see if they will examine the map—or else do, as has been done in Massachusetts and Minnesota, make the entire State one district, and then the judges may be sent anywhere within the State to hold court.

Florida is not such a very large State. It is large compared with some of the Atlantic States and the New England States, but in comparison with our Western States it is not large. It contains 58,000 square miles. Minnesota has 83,000 square miles, and the distances from southern to northern or northeastern Minnesota, on Lake Superior, are fully as great as the distances in Florida. So it seems to me that it is utterly unfair and unreasonable, under the circumstances, to ask for another judge for the southern district of Florida. The people themselves can correct and remedy the matter at their next legislature. They can set back to the northern district some of the territory that belongs to the northern district, equalize it, divide up the territory, and divide up the business so that each judge will get his fair share of the business. As it is now they have one judge in the southern district with a large amount of business on hand, and they have one judge in the northern district with little or no business. The total number of civil cases in his district was only 4. The total number of criminal cases—I read from the last report of the Attorney General—

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, the Senator suggests that the legislature can correct that situation. I submit that the legislature can not redistrict the State. Only Congress can take action of that sort.

Mr. NELSON. It can be done by an act of Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. That would not meet the situation.

Mr. NELSON. A bill can be introduced in Congress, and there is no trouble in passing such a bill, dividing up the territory equitably. The representatives of Florida brought about this condition themselves by securing legislation detaching most of the important part of the northern district from that district and assigning it to the southern district, and leaving the judge with only that little panhandle that runs west to Pensacola. All the rest of the State, all the business end of the State, all the populous end of the State is in the southern district. The northern district has next to no business.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator, he is discussing now the two districts in Florida, and is accounting for the fact that in one district there is a vast amount of business and in the other but little. Why does not Congress amend the act so that either the senior judge could call upon the other judge, or there could be a redistricting of the State with reference to population and litigation?

Mr. NELSON. This judge now can be called into the southern district, but they do not want him there, I presume. The judge in the northern district spends most of his time holding court in New York City, and there are one or two other cases of that kind in the country. When they come up here I will refer to them. Here is one district with little or no business, the northern district of Florida. They have a judge there. Instead of utilizing him in the southern district of Florida, as they might and ought to do, he goes off to New York and holds court up there during the whole summer, and has little or no business.

My position is this—and I say it in all fairness: The territory and population of these two districts should be equalized and put in such a condition that there is a fair proportion of population and business and territory in each district. If that is done, the two judges that are there now can easily do all the business in Florida. The same result can be reached in another way, by doing as they do in Massachusetts and as we do in Minnesota, and having the State all one district. That can be done. If the State were made all one district, the judges could go all over the State and change with one another.

Mr. KING. The Senator, if he is making a plea now for legislation of either character, I think, speaks wisely.

Mr. NELSON. I say, either one of those things can be done. I do not feel like initiating legislation of that kind for Florida. I am simply suggesting it. The legislation to remedy this evil ought to come from the Senators from Florida. Instead of that, they come up now and ask for an extra judge for the southern district, and do not propose to do anything about the other matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator concludes, if he has not already discussed the matter, I hope he will call attention to some of these other States—for instance, Massachusetts, where two judges are allowed—and demonstrate, as I think the Senator can, that there is no necessity for two additional judges in Massachusetts.

Mr. NELSON. I will refer to them when they come up; but Massachusetts has a lot of business. It has 3,000,000 people——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Four million.

Mr. NELSON. And there is a great commercial center there; and Massachusetts has only one Federal judge. Just think of that! Massachusetts to-day has only one Federal judge, and Florida, with not quite a million people, has two, and now the Senators from that State want a third, and they are finding fault because Massachusetts wants three.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that we are not finding fault with Massachusetts, but this is the situation: If we had an additional judge in the southern district of Florida we would still need all the time that Judge Sheppard, of the northern district, could spare from his court to assist the two in the southern district of Florida. Nobody dislikes Judge Sheppard. Everybody loves him, and he is a splendid judge; but he has his own court to attend to, and his district stretches over an area of 400 miles one way.

Mr. NELSON. I do not know what the reason is. I only know that he spends most of his time holding court in New York City, more than he does in the northern district of Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. He does both; but in summer he is obliged to come to New York for some reason or other, and he spends most of his time there, and he is helping out with the work all the time. He is not loafing.

Mr. NELSON. I shall not take up the time of the Senate in needless discussion. I have aimed to state the facts as I know them.

Judge Swayne, when he went down there, turned out to be a most unpopular judge. After he had been there about four years, or something like that, they cut up his district into pieces, as it is now. They followed that up by impeachment proceedings and a trial, and he was finally acquitted. I have nothing to say about that matter. I think there was some good ground for complaint against Judge Swayne; but I ask Senators to look at the map and see what resulted from cutting up his territory as they did and putting everything in the southern district of Florida. Look at the State of Georgia, and you will see that practically all the territory south of the southern line of Georgia down to the Gulf is in the southern district, while the panhandle that extends westward, which I understand is the poorest part of the State, the least densely inhabited, with the least towns, is put into one district, and the facts show that there is little, if any, business there. The total number of all kinds of cases in the district, outside of draft cases and bankruptcy cases, is 208. They had only one draft case in that district. They had 192 bankruptcy cases.

I can say nothing more. I have no feeling about this matter, Mr. President. I have simply aimed in this case, as I have in the others, to work in the interest of economy and the welfare of the United States.

The Senator from Florida took occasion to compare Florida with Minnesota. I want to say to him that Minnesota to-day has 2,500,000 people. It contains 83,000 square miles. From the southwest part of the State to the northeast part, on Lake Superior, is a distance of probably seven or eight hundred miles. It has two large cities, the great commercial and jobbing center of that northwestern territory, with a population in the two cities—and they have grown together so that it is difficult to tell one from the other—of over 600,000. It is not only a great wholesale and jobbing place for all that northwestern country, but it is a great railroad center. Outside of Chicago, I think it is the greatest railroad center in the Northwest anywhere. In addition to that it is by all odds and by great lengths ahead of every other city as a milling center. The quantity of wheat ground there and the volume of flour manufactured there is enormous. They grind from 25,000 to 50,000 barrels a day, and even more.

Then, in the northeastern part of our State, in the territory contiguous to or back of Duluth, we have the greatest iron mines in America. We produce from those iron mines I think somewhere around 70 per cent of all the iron ore mined in the United States. In one of the ranges—I believe the Cayuna Range—there is considerable manganese ore. Our mines are peculiar in this respect: We have not only the common deep mines, where they bore in the ground and hoist the water and the ore up to the surface, but we have large mines there on the Mesaba Range, where they plow and scrape off the ground on the surface, scrape it down to the iron ore, lay railroad tracks on top of the ore, blast the ore on both sides, and load it onto the cars with steam shovels like they load gravel out of a gravel pit onto a freight car. The business of Duluth is enormous. That is the point from which all the iron ore is shipped and nearly all the coal that Minnesota uses. The shipping is immense. Minnesota is unfortunate in one way. While we have such an abundance of iron we have no coal, and the result is that our iron ore is shipped from Duluth, Two Harbors, Superior, and other points at the head of the lake, down to the ports on Lake Erie, and our supply of coal is brought up in vessels. All this traffic makes a good deal of business for our courts.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] yesterday, in one of his questions, showed that he was astonished at the number of civil cases there were in Minnesota. If he knew the volume of business that was handled in the Twin Cities, as we call them, and at Duluth, in the iron mines and in the mills, he would not be astonished at that amount of litigation.

Mr. President, before I sit down I intend to refer to some remarks of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. If I understood him correctly, he held this bill to be unconstitutional because it provided for the transfer of judges, not only within a circuit but from one circuit to another. I think he went so far as to say it was unconstitutional and irregular. I do not intend to quote the statutes now, but if he will refer to the statutes he will find that there are in them to-day provisions for the transfer of judges from one district to another district in the same circuit, and that the transfer is to be made upon the certificate of the clerk of the court under the existing statutes.

He will also find in the existing statutes two provisions for transfer of judges from a district court in one circuit to another circuit. It is nothing new; it is in the statute now. Let me read the last part of section 13 of the Judicial Code:

> Whenever it shall be certified by any such circuit judge or, in his absence, by the circuit justice of the circuit in which the district lies, that for any sufficient reason it is impracticable to designate and appoint a judge of another district within the circuit to perform the duties of such disabled judge, the Chief Justice may, if in his judgment the public interests so require, designate and appoint the judge of any district in another circuit to hold said court and to discharge all the judicial duties of the judge so disabled.

I cite this because it shows that this provision is not new. Under certain conditions district judges can be transferred from one circuit to another.

Section 14 of the Judicial Code provides:

> When, from the accumulation or urgeny of business in any district court, the public interests require the designation and appointment hereinafter provided, and the fact is made to appear, by the certificate of the clerk—

And so forth.

I call attention to that to show that in the existing provision of law the transfer of a judge from one district to another in the same circuit is made upon the certificate of the clerk.

We do not adopt any new theory, but we adopt a more systematic plan of carrying out what is already in the statutes. The provisions which we have incorporated in the bill were prepared by Judge Dennison, one of the ablest and best circuit judges. There were provisions in the bill as it came to us from the House and there were provisions in the "18 judge" bill, what some called "roving" judges, introduced at the instance of the Department of Justice, in reference to this matter, but we adopted this language, and see how plain it is. Instead of leaving it to the certificate of the clerk of the court, we leave it to the judge. The bill provides that section 13 of the Judicial Code shall be amended so as to read:

> SEC. 13. (1) A district judge for a district may be designated to act in another district of the same circuit (including territory attached thereto)—
> (a) In the place of a district judge who is physically or mentally unable for the time being to perform his duties or who is or who is to be necessarily absent from his district;
>
> (b) In aid of a district judge who on account of the accumulation and urgency of business is unable to perform speedily all the work of his district;
>
> (c) In aid of a district judge when the public interests so require.

Listen to this:

> (2) Such designation shall be made by the senior circuit judge whenever he is satisfied that condition (a), (b), or (c) exists and that the designation can be carried out without such prejudice to the regular work of the designated judge as to make it inadvisable.

How much superior that is to this provision in the Judicial Code. I read it again:

> When, from the accumulation or urgency of business in any district court, the public interests require the designation and appointment hereinafter provided, and the fact is made to appear, by the certificate of the clerk—

It is left to the clerk of the court in the law as it is.

> Under the seal of the court, to any circuit judge of the circuit in which the district lies, or, in the absence of all the circuit judges, to the circuit justice of the circuit in which the district lies, such circuit judge or justice may designate and appoint the judge of any other district in the same circuit to have and exercise within the district first named the same powers that are vested in the judge thereof.

We do not change the principle of transfer. We only put it in a plainer and more workable manner than it is in the existing statute. There is no innovation. If this bill is unconstitutional, as the Senator contends, we have had unconstitutional provisions in our statutes ever since the Judicial Code was adopted, and even before that, because some of these provisions are taken out of the Revised Statutes.

Section 16 of the pending bill refers to the transfer of judges from one district to another in the same circuit. It provides:

The designation provided for by sections 13, 14, and 15—

That is, by the senior circuit judge or the circuit justice—

shall be in writing, signed by the judge or justice designating, and shall specify the district aided, the judge designated, and the period of service.

(2) It shall be filed in the clerk's office and entered in the minutes of the district court of the aided district—

And so forth.

I want to call attention to the simple and plain way in which we have provided for the transfer of a judge from one circuit to another, as compared with the existing statute. The pending bill provides:

SEC. 15. (a) A district judge of a district (called herein the home district) may be designated to act in any district of another circuit or its attached territory (called herein the aided district) in place of or in aid of a judge thereof, in case—

(a) The senior circuit judge of the aided district shall certify to the Chief Justice of the United States that the public interests require the designation of an additional judge or judges in such district and that it is impracticable to supply the need from among the judges of his circuit; and

(b) The senior circuit judge of the circuit of the home district shall certify to the Chief Justice of the United States—

And so forth.

In other words, the circuit judge of the home circuit of the judge who is to be transferred and loaned to another circuit has to certify that he can be spared, and then the judge of the other circuit has to certify that he is needed, and when the two judges so certify to the Chief Justice of the United States, he makes the transfer. Is not that more logical and more reasonable than the provision contained in this law I have quoted, which provides:

Whenever it shall be certified by any such circuit judge or, in his absence, by the circuit justice of the circuit in which the district lies, that for any sufficient reason it is impracticable to designate and appoint a judge—

And so forth.

In this bill we not only provide that the circuit judge of the circuit that is loaning the judge must certify that he can be spared, but that the circuit judge of the circuit in which it is desired to secure his services must certify that he is needed. In any case, it is left in the hands of the Chief Justice.

So in principle there is nothing novel in this. If the Senator maintained that a district judge having been appointed to a given district is an immovable fixture, and we have no constitutional right to move him from his own district, we would have no right to move him to a district in the same circuit. If you can move a district judge from his district to another district in the same circuit, what constitutional impediment is there to having that same district judge moved to another district in another circuit? In other words, if I may use a rather vulgar phrase, if you can move him from his roost at all, there is no reason why you can not move him from a district in one circuit to a district in another, if you can move him from one district to another in the same circuit.

I do not want my friend from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to think we are discriminating against him. There was another case brought before our committee somewhat similar to the Florida case. An amendment was offered, and we rejected it on the same principle on which I am opposed to the Florida amendment. I refer to the eastern district of Washington. An amendment no doubt will be offered covering that. What are the facts? The eastern district of Washington has not any more business than the northern district of Florida, if as much. Let me call attention to the amount of business in that district. The total number of cases, outside of bankruptcy and draft cases, was 104. That is less than the number in the district in Florida. Judge Rudkin, of that district, spends most of his time holding court in the northern and in the southern districts of California, and has spent very little time in his own district.

I make these statements because I want the Senator from Florida to understand that I did not discriminate against him. I took the same view of the Washington case that I did of the Florida case. The western district of Washington has two judges to-day. One of the judges in the western district spent part of his time in the southern district of California, and the other judge of that district spent a large portion of his time holding court in the city of New York.

I shall not weary the Senate further. We preach economy on the stump and here in the Senate, but when it comes to applying it as a practical matter I am sorry to say that we fail. I have always felt and I feel to-day that while I owe a duty to my constituents, I owe a higher duty to the Government of the United States.

It is my duty here at all times to stand for the welfare and protect the interests of the Federal Government. The Federal Government has many of what I might call quasi enemies. They think everything is fair to get from the Government. "Go to the Government and get anything you will and it is all right. Grab with all your might in any direction. Uncle Sam has shoulders enough and pockets enough to bear it."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. On that particular point I am quite convinced myself, and I believe I submitted an argument yesterday which would prove, that it would be more economical for the Government to place an additional judge in the southern district of Florida than it would be to keep sending help from the outside, even from the northern district.

But with reference to the case of Washington I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the table shows the total number of cases pending in the eastern district of Washington was 104 as against 1,336 pending in the southern district of Florida, and in the western district of Washington the total number of cases pending was 713 as against 1,336 in the southern district of Florida, and in the western district of Washington they already have two judges.

Mr. NELSON. I am aware of the fact, and it may seem ungracious to oppose Senators when they want additional judges. We are all creatures of circumstance, and we all have our friends and we all have our candidates for judges in one form or another. It may seem rather ungracious, but I refer to this case of the State of Washington more for the purpose at present of pointing out to the Senator from Florida that I was not actuated by any discriminatory feeling against their State. I took the same stand in reference to that matter that I did in the case of Florida, and I shall take it in every case if similar cases are brought here. I feel that my first duty is to protect the Federal Government, and next to that is the duty to do what is for the best interests of justice, economy, and good government.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am sure that no one would question the sincerity at all times of the Senator from Minnesota and no one would for a moment think of him being actuated by any discriminatory motives.

It is the policy of the bill, as brought before the Senate by the committee, to afford relief to districts in which relief is needed. The committee has not recommended a policy of consolidation of districts nor of the discontinuance of a particular district in a State, but has adopted a policy of considering the districts respectively. On yesterday my colleague very forcefully brought to the attention of the Senate in argument and by statistics the fact that the southern district of Florida is one of the most congested in its business and is needing relief as greatly as any district in the United States. Based upon the case of merit, upon the conditions which demand relief, we are asking the Senate to allow an additional judge for the southern district of Florida. The merits of the question have previously been considered by the Senate. On two occasions the Senate has previously passed a measure providing for an additional judge for this district in Florida. The merits have also been passed upon by the House, the House Committee on the Judiciary having recommended an additional judge, and in the bill of which this is an amendment the House wrote a provision for an additional judge in the southern district of Florida.

Take the question of the two districts in the State. It is true that there is a much larger volume of business in the southern than in the northern district. It is true that there is more territory in the southern than in the northern district. But this condition exists in almost every State of the Union in the United States district courts. An analysis of the situation will disclose that in many States where an increase in the judiciary is being authorized there are districts which are not congested, and in a number of instances districts which will have but little, if any, more business than the northern district of Florida. Take the court which has no more business than the court can dispatch, necessarily if we look at the docket of pending cases we can not determine the amount and the volume of business in that district, because it is not allowed to accumulate and to congest the dockets. On the other hand, in the congested districts, necessarily the business accumulates and piles up on account of the judge not being able to dispatch the business promptly.

The northern district of Florida covers in a very large measure the older part of the State. That is one of the best sections of our State, and there are many prosperous towns in that part of Florida which were not mentioned by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] in going over the list of cities and towns in the northern district.

I have not taken the time to compile the statistics, but I am confident that within that district there is a population of not less than 350,000. I know that the district embraces within its limits all of one congressional district and a considerable part of another congressional district in the State of Florida. It is true that the judge may have the time to work in another district, but, on the contrary, it is untrue that the judge of the northern district and the judge of the southern district of Florida would be able to attend to all of the business in the two districts.

In the Minnesota cases referred to it is true that in the two districts they have probably 200 more cases than they have in the two districts in Florida, but it is proposed on that account that an additional judge be given to Minnesota. In that case we would have an additional judge for Minnesota and the three judges in that State would find a docket of only about 100 more cases for consideration than the three judges would find in the two districts of Florida if we were allowed an additional judge for the southern part of that State.

The congestion in the southern district of my State is deplorable. It is absolutely impossible for one judge to dispatch the business coming before his court under the present conditions. There is not a judge in the United States who could do it. We have a very able and capable judge in that district, a man who is interested in his work, who is endeavoring to dispatch business, but it is humanly impossible for him to dispatch the work which is incumbent upon him in that large district.

Geographically speaking, it would be very inconvenient for the State of Florida to be consolidated into one district and have the headquarters of the court in one particular city. It is true that we have splendid railroad facilities and good train service, of which we are proud, but on account of the peculiar geographical condition and situation of the State we can not reach the northwestern part of the State from southern points without making an "elbow" to get into that part of the State. If one would go from any of the more northern or western section cities down into the interior or southern part of the State, it means a trip from Pensacola to Jacksonville and back down the other angle of the elbow to wherever he wishes to go.

It would be very impractical to have the districts consolidated. The most practical and logical thing to do is to have two districts in the State. If we consolidate the business of the two districts there will be more business than can possibly be dispatched, and dispatched as it should be, by two judges.

We have presented the case of the southern district of Florida, and, as I have before stated, the committee has adopted a policy of considering each district upon its own merits in other States. In this district, when the statistics were made which were presented to the committee, there were pending 1,336 cases, and we have only one judge. The bill provides for one new judge in the eastern district of New York and two for the southern district of New York, where they already have three judges, making a total of six, with nothing like the number of cases pending proportionately in those courts, according to the number of judges, that we have pending in the southern district of Florida. In the eastern district of Pennsylvania one additional judge is provided, although that district now has two judges, with a total of 2,788 cases pending, which is nothing like a proportionate number of cases, according to the number of judges, that are pending in the southern district of Florida.

In the western district of Pennsylvania, with a total of 2,449 cases pending, with two judges at present, it is proposed to authorize one additional judge. In that instance, if we divide the number of cases by two judges it will be found that there are only 1,224 cases pending before each judge. In the southern district of Florida there were 1,336 cases pending at the time the statistics found in the committee's report were prepared, and on account of the rapid increase of business to-day there are over 1,600 cases; yet an additional judge is authorized in the western district of Pennsylvania, with an average of only 1,224 cases to each judge, but an additional judge, in the opinion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], should be denied Florida, with 1,336 cases pending in the southern district of that State.

In the northern district of Texas we find there are two judges at present, with a total of 1,220 cases pending. The committee proposes to allow one additional judge to the northern district of Texas, which will give that district three judges, with 1,220 cases pending—a smaller number of cases pending for three judges than we have in the southern district of Florida for one judge.

In the eastern district of Michigan, with a total of only 754 cases pending, having already one judge of course, there is to be authorized under the pending bill an additional judge.

For the two districts of Ohio it is proposed to give one new judge. At present there are four judges in Ohio and there are 1,411 cases pending there. There is an instance where, with four judges at present and with only 1,411 cases pending, in comparison with 1,336 cases pending in the southern district of Florida, it is proposed to give an increase of one judge to be added to the four already sitting there at the present time.

The northern district of Illinois has two judges at present, with 2,184 cases pending, and it is proposed to authorize one new judge there. Even with only two judges, according to the statistics, they have no more upon them in the way of litigation to dispose of for each judge than does the judge of the southern district of Florida; yet it is proposed to allow an additional judge in the northern district of Illinois.

Take the eastern district of Missouri. At present there is one judge; the total number of cases pending in that district is 622; yet it is proposed under the pending bill to authorize an additional judge for the eastern district of Missouri.

Montana, with one judge and a total number of cases of 525, is to be given an additional judge by the pending bill.

For California, with two judges in the district and only 1,179 cases pending, it is proposed to provide an additional judge.

Arizona, with only 310 cases pending, is to have an additional judge.

Oklahoma, with 1,399 cases in the eastern district, is to have an additional judge. The Oklahoma case is one that might very reasonably be compared with the Florida case, because the number of cases pending in that court is approximately the same as in the southern district of Florida.

I submit, Mr. President, that doubtless in a number of these instances an additional judge should be authorized, and that the public business requires that Congress provide for additional assistance for the purpose of dispatching the court business of the country; but I can not quite conceive of the logic of some of our friends who oppose Florida having an additional judge for the southern district of the State when, upon the other hand, they are supporting each of these additional judgeships as provided in the pending measure.

All we ask for is that Florida be dealt with just the same as the other States and districts of the Union have been dealt with by the committee. We feel that Florida is justly entitled to an additional judgeship for the southern district of the State. We are actuated by absolutely sincere motives and only desire to have the public business of the State which is transacted by the Federal courts expeditiously carried on, as it should be.

In our State we have a number of good Republicans, one of whom, no doubt, will be appointed to the judgeship should it be created. We have no hope of having a Democrat appointed to the judgeship there; but we do feel that the business of the court in the southern district of the State demands this relief and that Florida deserves this consideration at the hands of Congress. I very much hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the amendment offered by my colleague the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] will be agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no hestiation in saying that the southern district of Florida, considered in and of itself, is entitled to an additional district judge; but I desire to suggest to the Senate some of the reasons which influenced the Judiciary Committee in the exclusion of that district, all of which reasons, at least, have not been stated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The general purpose of the committee was to provide the United States, as a whole, with a sufficient judicial force. In many instances the survey of the subject passed far beyond the immediate districts concerned. As the Senator from Minnesota has stated, the northern district of Florida has so little business of a judicial character that the judge of that district is able to employ half or more than half of all his time beyond the district, and latterly it has been employed beyond his circuit. It is very clear to me that in considering the needs of the southern district of Florida we ought to take into account and give great weight to the fact that the judge of the northern district of Florida could give half or more than half of his time to the work of the southern district of Florida, and I do not know of any reason why he should not be assigned to the southern district of Florida instead of being assigned to the southern district of New York.

Moreover, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to another fact. If Senators will look at the map that hangs on the wall, it will be seen that the States of Alabama and Georgia lie immediately north of and adjoining the State of Florida. The State of Alabama is already provided with three district judges, and I say frankly that I think it has more district judges than its necessities demand. The State of Georgia has two district judges, but this bill provides another judge for Georgia. If that provision remains in the bill, it will be seen that the group of States composed of Georgia, Alabama, and Florida will have eight district judges. I think eight district judges are all that are required and, indeed, more than are required for the transaction of the judicial business of those three States. I have no doubt—at least, it was so with me, and I think it was so with some of the other members of the committee—that we took into account the judicial force of that group of States; and there is no reason in the world why the eight district judges should not combine their energies for the purpose of trying cases in those States.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURSUM in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. Referring to the argument the Senator is making as to the three States he has mentioned, and especially as to Florida, where he speaks of the northern district not having sufficient business to occupy the judge all the time—I have not examined it, and I do not know how it is in detail, but I will look at it—and therefore that he should aid in the southern district, where unquestionably great congestion exists, I ask the Senator, why was not that principle applied to the State of Ohio? It is conceded that the two judges in the southern district have their dockets clean and tried up, and that they are spending much of their time in holding court in other districts. Why give a new judge to the northern district of Ohio, instead of letting the two from the southern district relieve that congestion?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think that is true of the southern district of Ohio in the degree or anything approaching the degree in which it is true of the northern district of Florida; and the docket of the southern district of Ohio, as I remember, is very much larger than the docket in the northern district of Florida. Let us see.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, we know as a fact that those two judges are holding court in other districts.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know it personally.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator will remember that Judge Sater, of Columbus, of that district, stated before the committee that he held court in Pennsylvania and in Tennessee and in some other districts.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I do know that; and I think it is a very common thing; but I do not know that Judge Sater was absent from his own district for months at a time, although he may have been. I have no information on that subject; but I desire the Senate to know that in the southern district of Ohio on the 30th of June last there were 448 criminal cases pending and undisposed of, and that there were 309 civil cases pending and undisposed of.

I mention these things, Mr. President, simply to show that the committee made an effort to provide sufficient judicial force in every part of the country; and with me, at least, the fact that the northern district of Florida had little business, and that there are to be six judges in Alabama and Georgia, influenced my action to some extent.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, permit me to call the Senator's attention to this situation, which evidently escaped the committee in considering this bill if they were looking at it from the standpoint the Senator now mentions.

New York, for instance, has nine judges already. The committee proposes to give that State three more. There are certain districts in New York where they certainly do not need any additional judges, and where they have no more business than in the northern district of Florida. Take Vermont and Connecticut, right around New York, and that whole region: In Vermont, for instance, the total number of cases is 185, and in Connecticut the total number of cases is 386. There they have two judges, nine judges in New York, right in that immediate vicinity, and the same way in New Hampshire.

Mr. CUMMINS. The committee took those facts into consideration. New York has a population of more than 9,000,000 people, and the circuit is composed of New York, Connecticut, and Vermont.

Mr. FLETCHER. They have 9 judges in New York alone, 1 in Vermont, 1 in Connecticut, 1 in New Hampshire, and so forth; but I say that if the committee were reviewing the matter from that standpoint they could have found in these circuits, right adjacent to each other, less need for additional judges than exists in the southern district of Flordia; and the Senator is altogether mistaken about the idea that the judge in the northern district of Florida has practically nothing to do, or that only a small portion of his time is taken up with his work. The figures show that there are pending in that court, undisposed of, 209 cases, and in addition to that 192 bankruptcy cases, 1 draft case, and 22 prohibition cases, making a total of 424 cases pending now in the northern district of Florida.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is including the draft and the prohibition and the bankruptcy cases.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; but there are 209 cases outside of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not mean to be understood as saying that there was no business in the northern district of Florida; but I said that the business of the northern district of Florida did not consume more than half the time of the judge of that district.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice that this report states the number of cases that are pending that have not been tried in the various districts, and it seems that that moved the committee to make its various recommendations. Did they not take into consideration the number of cases that were tried in these various courts? Does not the Senator think that that is a better way to judge as to the need of a new judge, rather than to state how many cases are left over and not tried?

Mr. CUMMINS. The committee undertook, as well as it could, to examine the report of the Attorney General showing the number of cases that had been disposed of in the various courts during the preceding year.

Mr. HARRISON. It would seem to me that the fact that there were not many cases left over shows that one judge was doing his duty, and that those who had a lot of cases left over were not doing their duty. What I rose to ask the Senator, however, was this: He was speaking of that southern tier of States there—Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not speak of Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. That is why I am going to ask the Senator a question. I am wondering if there was any method in that madness or in that omission. Why was Mississippi omitted in the discussion of the Senator?

Mr. CUMMINS. There was no movement upon the part of anyone representing Mississippi for additional judicial force, and I infer from the record made by the report of the Attorney General that those representing Mississippi, not only here but in the other House, felt that they could not conscientiously ask for another judge, in view of the comparatively little business done in the court in Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. That does not answer the question that I propounded to the Senator. I asked him why it was that he omitted to mention Mississippi in connection with his discussion a few moments ago, when he said that there were so many judges for Alabama, Georgia, and Florida.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not mention Mississippi because Alabama and Georgia lie immediately north of Florida and have an easy entrance into Florida through the means of communication that are established, and the judges of Alabama and of Georgia, assuming that all their time would not be required at home—and as to that I assert nothing—can easily reach Florida.

Mr. HARRISON. It was not, then, because if the one judge who is assigned to Mississippi under the law had been added to the sum total of those in Georgia and Alabama and Florida it would reduce the average that the Senator omitted the State of Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I should be sorry to arrange a system that would require the single judge that Mississippi has to be assigned anywhere else. I think the judge in Mississippi has all that a judge can comfortably do.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator said that Mississippi was omitted because apparently the Senators and the delegation in the House made no move to bring that about.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I said that it was not considered because apparently there had been no representations from Mississippi that the work there had accumulated so that an additional judge was necessary.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Mississippi could do no more than to offer an amendment and to introduce a bill; and the Senator from Iowa, of course, is aware that there is pending a bill to create a new judgeship for Mississippi, and that an amendment was offered to this bill to that effect; and I think the Senator from Tennessee offered that amendment in the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember that the Senator from Tennessee offered such an amendment, though he may have done so.

Mr. HARRISON. It would have taken the usual course and been defeated had it been offered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know that. If the Senator means that there was any discrimination on account of the locality from which the amendment came, he is very much mistaken, because we have added in this bill, I think, everything considered, quite as liberally to the South as we have to the North.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; you have put in 3 judges for the South and 16 for the North. That is the liberality that the Senator's committee has shown.

Mr. SHIELDS. And that is enough.

Mr. HARRISON. That is enough under the present circumstances, I think. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the Senator is aware, because he has been on the committee for a long time and he has voted three times, I think, for a bill which has passed the Senate for the creation of another judgeship in Mississippi——

Mr. CUMMINS. Never.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator may have done it when he did not know what he was voting for, but I will say to the Senator that on three different occasions bills have passed the Senate for the creation of a second judgeship for Mississippi.

Mr. CUMMINS. What the Senator means is that I did not raise my voice in protest against the bill when it was on its passage.

Mr. HARRISON. The thing I am surprised at is that the Senator did not raise his voice in behalf of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have never voted for a bill of that character, and I have never voted for one for the middle district of Tennessee. I have been opposed mainly to these additions heretofore.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the Senator think this is an almost inexcusable course on the part of the committee when it is realized that Mississippi has one judge for two courts and at an expense of only $7,500 we could create one more judgeship in Mississippi? Three bills creating judgeships have passed in the Senate before, and this attitude of the committee seems unjust when you take into consideration the fact that in some of the adjoining States there are as many as three judges with little or no more business. Is there any excuse for omitting the creation of an additional judgeship for Mississippi under those circumstances?

Mr. CUMMINS. There was one reason for the omission of a provision for an additional judge from Mississippi, and that is outweighed by another reason. The reason for the creation of a new judgeship lies in the fact that Mississippi is one of two instances in the United States in which there is not a judge for each district. The other instance is the middle district of Tennessee. That can be said in favor of appointing a new judge in Mississippi. On the other hand, a comparison of the business done in Mississippi—and it is greatly to the credit of Mississippi that there is no more business than there is—I think shows that the State is not entitled to another judge.

Mr. HARRISON. But I had understood the Senator to say that he had not investigated the situation so far as Mississippi is concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. The figures are before us.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator refers to the figures showing the number of cases which are pending; but the Senator did not investigate, as I understood him to say, the number of cases now being tried in the courts there.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator misunderstood me. The report of the Attorney General shows the number of cases which were tried the year preceding the 30th of June, 1921, and all the members of the committee, I assume, have investigated those statistics.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it the opinion of the Senator that the Senate would not be justified in adopting an amendment to this bill creating another judgeship for Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. Regrettable as that may seem to be, that is my opinion.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sorry to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would like to know if the Senator thinks that of the middle district of Tennessee. He says he never voted for an additional judge for that district.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator please repeat the question?

Mr. SHIELDS. I would like to know if the Senator has the same opinion as to the middle district of Tennessee that he has of the Mississippi district? The northern district of Mississippi and the middle district of Tennessee are the only two districts in the United States which have no judges.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee stated the fact correctly. Does he now ask me my opinion as to the advisability of another judge?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I adhere to the action of the committee in that respect. I intend to be loyal so far as the committee in concerned. I have not been attempting, the Senator knows, to work out my individual views respecting the distribution of these judges.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have not made any such insinuation, even, much less statement, to the Senator, but the Senator said he had never voted for an additional judge for the middle district of Tennessee. Of course, a measure so providing could have passed without his vote. A bill has passed the Senate three times in the last 10 years for that purpose, but failed in the House. The Senator has two districts in his State and one judge in each, and the two districts in Tennessee, presided over by Judge Edward T. Sanford, of the eastern district, have more business than those two districts in the State of Iowa, where they have two judges. I will present the figures later. I invite the Senator's attention now to the fact that Judge Sanford is now doing more work than both of the Iowa judges are doing, each and every day.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Iowa begs leave also to remind the Senator from Tennessee that Iowa has not asked for an additional judge. I do not think we need an additional judge.

Mr. SHIELDS. But to put it back on the same basis Tennessee is on, Iowa ought to have one of those judgeships abolished.

Mr. CUMMINS. I question very much whether the Senator can, by any satisfactory evidence, prove that any judge in his State is doing twice as much work as a judge in my State.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Tennessee judge is doing more than both of the Iowa judges. I will present the figures later.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator will not be able to satisfy me, at least, by any proof he may have in his possession on that point, because I am familiar with my own State and know what has been done. I know that we have had one judge for the last year or more who has been practically disabled, and therefore has done no work, or substantially no work, other than the trial of criminal cases. The judge who has been at work has done as much, I venture to say, as any district judge in the United States.

Mr. President, I have nothing further to say, and I ask for a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Florida desire a full Senate when we vote on this question?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not material to me. I think we could carry the amendment now, as the Senate stands, and I am ready for a vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. Fearing that such would be the result, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	Norris	Shortridge
Broussard	Heflin	Overman	Underwood
Bursum	Jones, Wash.	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Cameron	Kendrick	Phipps	Warren
Capper	Keyes	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Cummins	McKinley	Pomerene	Weller
Dial	McNary	Rawson	Williams
Fletcher	Moses	Reed
France	Nelson	Sheppard
Harris	New	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. LADD, Mr. ODDIE, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. SPENCER, and Mr. WADSWORTH answered to their names when called.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are absent in attendance on the Committee on Finance.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Lenroot	Simmons	Curtis	Swanson
Townsend	Stanley	Gooding	Trammell

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Thursday, April 6, at not later than 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the Senate shall, without further debate, vote upon all amendments that are pending or that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. I regret to object; but one of the most important amendments that could possibly be offered to the bill has not been discussed at all, and I may want to discuss it unless it is accepted.

Mr. CUMMINS. There will be ample time between now and then.

Mr. HARRISON. Between now and 4 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. CUMMINS. When we shall conclude this afternoon I will ask for a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and the recess will not be taken before half past 5.

Mr. HARRISON. There is a very important resolution which goes over from to-day until to-morrow, and I shall want it acted on to-morrow. So I object.

Mr. SHIELDS. Would it not be better to make it 4 o'clock Friday?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am willing to make it 4 o'clock Friday. Will the Assistant Secretary state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, so that we may all understand it?

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Friday, April 7, 1922, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States; to provide for annual conference of certain judges of United States courts; to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside of their districts, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thought it was the purpose of the Senator to vote this afternoon on the amendments that are pending now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to ask the Senate to remain in session until half past 5 for the very purpose of voting on the pending amendments.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator does not intend to hold up the vote on all amendments until Friday afternoon?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not. I desire to dispose of just as many of them as possible to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and it is entered into. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the committee amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK. Has the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I am compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRISON (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and in his absence I withdraw my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I observe that my general pair [Mr. WALSH of Montana] is absent from the Chamber. I transfer that general pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote "nay."

So Mr. FLETCHER's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to reserve the amendment which has just been voted on for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. REED. I am going to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he will not do me the favor to let me offer an amendment to the bill at this time, because I think I have to leave the city?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I withhold my amendment for the present, in view of the request of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment by inserting after the word "one" in line 18, page 10, the following:

For the western district of Missouri, one.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall take the time of the Senate only very briefly to state the situation existing in Missouri. The business of the Federal courts of that State has been growing enormously for several years. We have two judges; one of them Judge Van Valkenburgh, happens to be a Republican, and holds court in the western district, and the other, Judge Faris, who happens to be a Democrat, holds court in the eastern district. Federal court terms are held at several points in the State. The House bill allowed two additional judges for Missouri, one for the eastern and one for the western district. The Senate committee eliminated the provision for an additional judge for the western district. I thought it had been arranged that there would be a different result from that, but I am not here now to urge that matter of procedure.

The city of St. Louis has been growing very rapidly, Kansas City has also been growing very rapidly; in fact, all of that section of the country has been growing in population and business. Both of our judges are vigorous men; both are worked to the point of absolute exhaustion; and yet the business of their courts is falling behind.

I want to say for both Judge Faris and Judge Van Valkenburgh that they dispatch business rapidly; they are industrious; but it is greatly feared by members of the bar that they will break down under the strain which they are now enduring.

The increased criminal business, owing to the recent legislation of Congress, is now taking almost all of the time of those judges; civil business can not be attended to. I make that statement now from my personal knowledge, because I still practice law, and in that way I know the condition of the court dockets. The loss to the people of the State and to litigants through this congestion of business amounts to many times more than the salaries of the judges.

I think I will merely put into the RECORD, as much more conclusive than anything I can say, statements of the two district judges and the statement of his honor, Judge Sanborn, who is the presiding justice of the circuit court of appeals. Judge Sanborn states:

A dispatch from Washington in one of the newspapers states that you have renewed your endeavor to get an additional district judge for the western district of Missouri. One is greatly needed there, as you and I know, and I hope you will succeed. To that end I have written a letter to Senator NELSON and presented, as well as I could in a short letter, the great need of an additional judge there.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER H. SANBORN,
Senior Circuit Judge.

I will read an excerpt from a letter from Judge Faris, who is the judge of the eastern district:

I have your wire of to-day and have just wired you as follows: "Humanly impossible one judge to do work in eastern district Missouri. Health breaking under strain, and unable to keep up. Compared to five years ago, cases filed increased 100 per cent, not including bankruptcy cases. Latter increased over 30 per cent same period. Must have help. Letter follows."

In his letter the judge states:

As shown by the figures inclosed, I have disposed of 808 cases in the fiscal year preceding July 1, 1921, besides handling a vast amount of administrative work and all of the bankruptcy work. Since July 1, 1921, I have been disposing proportionately of more work than was done in the fiscal year of 1921. I can not keep this up, and I am frank to say to you that I am not going to keep it up. I simply can not stand the strain, and if Congress will not treat this district fairly, I shall be compelled to do what I can and let the rest go undone. If Congress continues to pursue the present course of taking over all criminal cases from the States, it will only be a short time until the 73 State judges will be enjoying perennial vacations and the two district judges will be doing all the work. The situation is very serious, and something must be done.

Very truly yours,

C. B. FARIS.

I agree with all the judge says, except that the State courts will still have business to do, but there is a vast amount being thrown into the Federal courts.

I have a letter here from Judge Van Valkenburgh, who is the judge of the western district. It is a very complete review of the business in the court. I shall read the letter and call it particularly to the attention of the Senate:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
WESTERN DISTRICT OF MISSOURI,
Kansas City, February 24, 1922.

Hon. JAMES A. REED,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your telegram of to-day asking for my views in regard to an additional judge for the western district of Missouri and condition of the dockets is duly received. I wired you this morning in general terms promising to follow with a letter containing additional data.

While this matter was before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate early this month Senator SPENCER telegraphed for information. I was ill at the time, but the district attorney compiled the data to the best of his ability, and the information conveyed is embodied in the inclosed file of telegrams which I have had copied and inclose for your information. This carried the matter up to February 9. Of course, it is not as accurate as the annual compilation for the Attorney General, but it is substantially so. You will realize that we have four outlying divisions: St. Joseph, Springfield, Joplin, and Jefferson City. The dockets are lodged with the deputy clerks at those points, and it would be impossible for us to get letter perfect figures from them without a consumption of time which is prohibitive for your needs. However, we can give that approximately.

Roughly speaking, Kansas City has from 70 to 75 per cent of the business of the entire district, civil and criminal, and if I give you the comparative figures for Kansas City you can get a fair approximation for the entire district. This, however, is to be noted: In the outlying divisions I have endeavored to keep the work up in all departments as nearly as practicable, feeling that it was better that the substantial part of our falling behind should be concentrated here at home in one division, where I could deal with it to better advantage than to have it scattered over the entire district; therefore while there has been a certain percentage of deferred business in these outlying districts, it has not been, and is not, so serious. Having informed yourself of the condition of the district for this fiscal year up to February 9 from the report of the district attorney to Senator SPENCER, I will submit some data in all departments affecting the Kansas City division. Of course, the business of the district for the last fiscal year, as well as that of other districts, is disclosed in the Attorney General's Report for 1921.

July 1, 1921, there were pending in the Kansas City division 69 criminal cases; since that date 480 prosecutions of all kinds have been placed upon the docket, making a total of 549. During this period I have disposed of 55 of the old cases and 388 of the new cases, aggregating 443, and leaving 106 still pending. In addition, the commissioners advise me that they have bound over for action by the next grand jury at the April term, or for the district attorney by information, 250 cases. There are still two months to elapse before that court opens on the fourth Monday in April, and at the present rate the number of cases bound over will total about 500, so that we shall start the April term with from five to six hundred criminal cases upon the docket. We shall probably dispose of a few, but not many, between now and then, because we can have no more juries in Kansas City before the next term. Meantime, we hold the St. Joseph term, beginning the first Monday in March; the Jefferson City term, which is fixed for the third Monday in March; and the Springfield term, which opens the first Monday in April. Following Kansas City we shall have the Joplin term, still in this fiscal year, which begins the second Monday in June. All these terms have now become very active, especially on the criminal side, and St. Joseph and Joplin particularly on the civil side. You may get some idea of the volume of business in these outlying districts when I tell you that 20 criminal cases had to be left undisposed of at the last term in St. Joseph, and that 43 new ones have been added to the docket, making a total of 63. This number will be increased to some extent before court opens. Because of the fact that I have five active divisions of this court, in each of which two terms are held annually, but a limited time can be allowed to each division. This, of course, greatly interferes with the dispatch of business where there is but one judge, who must distribute himself over the entire territory. But two weeks each can be allotted to the outlying divisions, and about eight weeks to the spring term at Kansas City. The November term can be somewhat extended by holding jury terms after the first of the year, excluding the Joplin term in January, but this is done at the expense of the equity docket, which can be held only at such times as no jury sessions are on. This climate is not adapted to court work in July and August, as you know, and not even our State courts attempt to hold trial terms during those months.

At the last spring term in Kansas City, which was the first term at which the extraordinary congestion of criminal business developed, 286 prosecutions were instituted, as against 480 for this November term. From this the great increase in the volume of business may be perceived; and this in spite of the fact that last year out of 722 prosecutions in the entire district I disposed of 655, in which there were 593 convictions, collected fines aggregating $99,000, and sent hundreds to jail and to the penitentiary in the hope of breaking the back of this crime wave. This year, in spite of that attempted object lesson, I have already disposed of more than one-half that number in Kansas City alone. We have thus far collected only a little more than $40,000 in fines, indicating an increased severity in prison sentences, always imposing the limit where the defendants have stood trial, and still the dance goes merrily on. It is realized, of course, because these parties and their attorneys are not fools, that this court, with its present force, must necessarily be hopelessly clogged if the present system continues; that if greater severity is exercised and the number of trials correspondingly and naturally increases, the court can not begin to handle the criminal docket alone, which, even at present, it can not quite compass. This court must therefore degenerate into a second-class criminal tribunal, and the civil business of the district must go to the dogs. This is so self-evident that I feel almost ashamed to presume to take up your time by stating it.

If Congress passes drastic laws, which meet with stubborn resistance, it can not expect those laws to be enforced unless it provides adequate machinery for that purpose. It seems hardly fair to throw upon the courts responsibility for a condition which they are helpless to remedy. Incidentally for several years, even before the present influx, this court, by comparison with other districts, has been entitled to an additional judge. If we have such, the very certainty that business can be reached and dispatched will have a wholesome effect upon the temper of the community and of those who are disposed to set the law at defiance. My great concern has been that the prestige of the Government should not suffer in the estimation of the public—a situation fraught with great future menace.

There is another consideration not disclosed by the naked figures of reports from the districts to the Attorney General. The district courts are now burdened with a great volume of business that is not disclosed by the figures of cases brought and disposed of. We have a large bankruptcy business, and many reviews come to the court from the orders and rulings of the referees. Some of these involve records and issues equal to the report of a master or a final hearing in general equity cases. They do not appear upon the docket as cases brought and disposed of. We have to sit in three judge cases, many of them where State statutes are involved, and we are drafted from time to time upon the circuit court of appeals, already overtaxed by the volume of appeal cases. If the district judges are kept sitting continuously in trial dockets and can not give necessary consideration to the briefs of counsel upon abstruse questions in involved and complex cases, of which we get many, the unsatisfactory disposition of those cases leads necessarily to a greater number of appeals and a greater burden upon appellate courts.

Applications for restraining orders, injunctions, and receiverships are greatly increasing in volume; they must be heard and they should be carefully considered. There are now pending something like 27 receiverships in this district, including those few in charge of circuit judges. The court should be able to give adequate supervising attention to such, and the work of the court is greatly increased by enforced attention to such proceedings. No week passes without one or more of such applications being presented. Furthermore, with but one judge in a district of this size and volume of business, it is impossible to follow up cases with promptness and decision. Where juries intervene with such continuity, equity cases wait upon juries, or great expense to the Government must be entailed. All the matters to which I have referred are pregnant with substance. I have been able to do little more than suggest the topics, relying upon the appreciation of sound and experienced lawyers like yourself and others upon the Judiciary Committee to accord to them their practical significance.

Recurring to the civil docket, I find that in Kansas City alone during the fiscal year ending July 1, 1921, 163 cases were brought and 121 disposed of. I held a civil jury trial docket in Kansas City in the fall but was unable to do so in the spring. This year already there have been filed 135 civil cases in Kansas City, and but 65 have been disposed of, no civil jury trials having been held in Kansas City.

Let me pause there. That is just the condition of the docket. The civil cases have to wait. Business of the very greatest importance is held up. The loss to litigants is tremendous, and the general disruption of the legal business is becoming not only burdensome, but—I do not like to use the word "frightful"—it is in a very bad condition.

This letter continues:

Of course, in this number of 65 there have been a few equity cases and hearings to the court, but the greater part of these cases have been settled and disposed of because of the uncertainty of a jury session. These figures indicate, however, that the civil docket is increasing, while my ability to dispose of it has been obstructed by the mass of criminal work. In 1921, 73 civil cases to which the United States was a party were brought and 49 disposed of. This year, so far, 31 have been brought and 39 disposed of in Kansas City. These cases, of course, are not of the importance and do not entail such work as those to which the United States is not a party above referred to.

It will be instructive to compare the work of this district for the year ending July 1, 1920, with that of the year ending July 1, 1921. In the former year in the entire district 306 criminal cases were commenced and 263 disposed of; 211 civil cases to which the United States was not a party were brought and 241 disposed of. Last year 722 criminal cases were brought and 655 disposed of, and 226 civil cases were commenced and 181 disposed of. There was a net accumulation of 45 of such cases upon the civil docket.

It is further instructive to compare the work of this district for the last fiscal year with some other districts to which, I understand, it is proposed to give additional judges. Compare, with the figures above stated for the fiscal year ending in 1921 in this district, the eastern district of Michigan, in which 580 criminal cases were brought and 382 disposed of and 187 civil cases were brought and 132 disposed of. With the district of Arizona, in which 462 criminal cases were brought and 471 disposed of and 138 civil cases brought and 98 disposed of. I do not complain that these districts are to get help. I believe that the judicial establishments pretty well all over the United States should be greatly increased. I merely wonder why this district is ignored. It is idle to suggest sending in a nonresident judge from time to time to relieve the situation. In the first place such a judge would be needed all the time, and in the second place any visiting judge accomplishes but a small percentage of what can be accomplished by a resident judge, with local responsibility and knowledge of local affairs. This fact is notorious among all who have any knowledge and experience with nisi prius courts. The question of expense of providing an adequate number of judges is comparatively negligible; but this is immaterial. The Government must have adequate machinery with which to function, and its cost is as imperative as that of any other item in the Budget.

With sincere appreciation of your efforts, I am,

Cordially yours,

ARBA S. VAN VALKENBURGH,
District Judge.

Mr. President, in addition to that I desire to call attention particularly to the letter of Judge Sanborn, the presiding judge of the court of appeals, who stands in a disinterested position, and who is one of the very great judges of this country; and I think I can include right next to him these two district judges as among the very fine judges. I am not claiming that they are better than all the others. The country would be fortunate if it had judges of that character in all of our courts.

I present the petition of the executive committee of the Missouri Bar Association, signed by all of the members of the executive committee, in which they dwell upon the necessity of an additional judge in both the eastern and western districts. It is as follows:

Petition to Congress of executive committee of Missouri Bar Association to provide additional judges in Missouri.

To the Congress of the United States:

The executive committee of the Missouri Bar Association respectfully represents that the business in the Federal courts in both the eastern and western districts of Missouri has multiplied in the last three or four years to such an extent that the dockets have become badly congested, and that, although the judges of these courts are highly efficient and working hard and faithfully all of the time, they have been unable to dispose of the business coming before them, and that the civil docket in the western district is now nearly one year behind; that the business in both districts is growing constantly and that there is more than sufficient business in each district to provide constant work for an additional judge in each district.

Speaking for the bar of Missouri generally, we urge upon the Congress the creation of judgeships in both districts of Missouri. If the creation of new judgeships, as suggested, is not provided, it will result in the practical denial of justice to litigants in these districts.

We are sincere in stating that, in our opinion, there are no districts in the United States that are more in need of additional judges than the districts of Missouri.

President.
KENNETH C. SEARS,
Secretary.
VINTON PIKE,
Vice President.
D. D. DUTTON,
Treasurer.
J. E. MCBAINE,
Vice President.
JNO. C. CARR,
Vice President.
R. B. OLIVER, Jr.,
Vice President.

I do not want to take the time of the Senate to read them, but I have here telegrams, and a large number that I do not hold in my hand but have upon my desk, which come from the very best of our lawyers, men who have large business, and without exception they all tell the same story.

So, Mr. President, I venture to ask that the Senate agree to this amendment. I am as much in favor of economy as other Senators. There is no economy in a congested court. There is no economy in trying to run a machine that is so overburdened that it can not do the work. The immense cost to litigants is a thing to be considered. The loss in money to the taxpayers who have to go to these courts to have their business attended to is to be considered. The convenience of lawyers who have to practice in the courts is to be considered. The salary of an additional district judge amounts absolutely to nothing in comparison with the distress and loss occasioned by failing to have a sufficient number of judges.

So far as I am concerned, I do not want to see unnecessary judgeships created anywhere; but we must take into consideration the fact that we have doubled and then doubled again and I think then doubled again the work of our United States courts. We have put upon them the burden of trying a vast flood of fraud cases that ordinarily, or before we enacted the mail-fraud statute, never would have reached the Federal courts at all. We have imposed upon them another vast amount of business growing out of the enlargement of our interstate commerce statutes, both civil and criminal. We have imposed upon them a vast criminal business growing out of the Mann Act, and now an almost illimitable flood of work growing out of the prohibitory law; and I think the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge will feel that, whatever may be the fate of this bill as a whole, it ought to include this additional judge.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I feel with regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] precisely as I felt with regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I was of the opinion, as a member of the committee, that there ought to be one additional district judge in Missouri; but, comparing the necessities in Missouri with the necessities elsewhere, and with our provisions made for other communities, I could not see my way clear to the addition of two judges in Missouri. I should be glad if the same arrangement could be made in Missouri that is expected to be made in Georgia, and have the district judge that we have added made a judge of both the eastern and the western districts; but there is no movement of that kind, and hence, I suppose, that will not be done.

The personal knowledge of the Senator from Missouri respecting the work that is actually being done and the work that is left undone has very great weight with me. So far as my own vote is concerned, I shall stand with the action of the committee; but there is nothing more to be said than has been said. The Senator from Missouri has read in substance the report of the Attorney General, and has supplemented it with a statement from the judge himself. Apparently nothing remains to be said, and I am quite willing to have it disposed of at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment of the committee.

On a division the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, in the provisions of this bill the district of New Jersey is not provided for. In view of the location and certain conditions existing in my State, I desire to present some facts for the consideration of the Senate and at the close of my remarks to offer an amendment to this bill which I trust will receive the favorable consideration of the Senate.

In the first place, I wish to point out how the location of New Jersey results in much litigation which is not found to nearly so great an extent in most of the other Federal districts. We have an exceptionally long seacoast. This, coupled with the fact that we are located between the two great ports of New York and Philadelphia, results in the courts of our State trying exceptionally large numbers of admiralty and maritime cases.

Of these admiralty cases there were 178 pending at the close of business on June 30, 1921, this number being exceeded by only one district, that of New York, and equaled by two others. Another need is found in the fact that a great number of our large corporations are incorporated under the laws of New Jersey. Because of this we have a large number of cases; but here it is not only the number of cases which should be considered but the importance of these cases. Inasmuch as in many cases patents are involved, the litigation is important because of the large amount of money involved and also the large amount of time consumed in trying the cases. A case in point is the case between the Buckeye Powder Co. against E. I. du Pont de Nemours Powder Co., which consumed five months' time in the trying.

This case illustrates another point: That is, that although the plaintiffs are in a great many cases from outside the State, the litigation is brought to New Jersey because the defendant is incorporated under the laws of the State. The same applies to many of the citizens of the State who have either New York or Philadelphia for their place of business. Because of their citizenship in New Jersey they are tried under the New Jersey courts.

Therefore, in addition to the usual criminal, civil, and bankruptcy cases found on the docket of the average Federal court, we have in New Jersey, because of its location and laws governing corporations, large numbers of admiralty and corporation cases.

I want to say at this point that unfortunately I was unable to appear before the Judiciary Committee and present the claims of my State. It is a matter of great importance to the bar of New Jersey and to the State and to its jurisprudence. By reason of that fact I spoke to the chairman of the committee and asked that I have an opportunity of presenting my claims to the Senate, and I hope at least those Senators who are here will listen for a few minutes—and I will only take that time—to the claims of New Jersey, and to a statement of the present condition of the Federal courts of the State.

Another point which shows the need of another judge, which is also emphasized by our location, is the number of cases arising out of the prohibition enforcement law. In the hearings held before the committee it was brought out that one of the chief causes of congestion is the number of cases pending arising under the prohibition law. At the end of June, 1921, there were 395 criminal and 34 civil prohibition cases pending.

At the present time we have three Federal judges sitting at Trenton, the capital of the State, thus doing away with considerable overhead expense which is necessary when the judges move from place to place. These judges are giving full time to their duties; I should say that they are hard-working judges, of the highest character and standard of ability, but the dockets are overcrowded, there being 13,567 cases pending on June 30 of last year.

Comparing the number of judges to population for the entire country we find that the ratio is one judge to each 800,000 of population, which ratio would entitle New Jersey, with its 3,155,000 people, to four judges. In 1898 we had one judge in the district. Now we have three, but the volume of business has increased at a much faster rate, being tenfold larger now than at that time. In 1915, at the close of the fiscal year, 111 civil cases were pending, while on the same date in 1921, 331 cases were pending, a larger number than in any other district excepting the southern district of New York. In criminal cases in 1915, at the close of the fiscal year, there were pending 145 cases, while on the same date of 1921 there were pending 11,582, this large increase being partially accounted for by the number of selective-draft cases. In the admiralty cases we had 178 cases pending, and in bankruptcy 914 on June 30 last. Other cases to which the United States was not a party totaled 562, making the grand total of cases pending 13,567. This number in itself would justify another judge for this district, but when it is considered that the amount of litigation is increasing rather than decreasing, due to growth in population, expanding business enterprises, and the coming in of new corporations, an additional judge is an absolute necessity if the Federal courts are to discharge their functions expeditiously and the needs of the situation met.

Because of overcrowded dockets the Federal judges themselves have indorsed the need for the appointment of another judge. The New Jersey Bar Association has indorsed and requested that Congress act in the interest of the proper dispatch of the business coming before these courts.

I might say here that this bar association is composed of the ablest and best lawyers who have ever practiced in any court. We have a splendid bench and bar in New Jersey. These gentlemen have come here and urged that I present to the Senate and the Judiciary Committee the great need at the present time for an additional judge. The respective bar associations of the various counties of the States have likewise indorsed this request.

Unfortunately, I did not have an opportunity of appearing before the committee, but I know what the conditions of the courts are at the present time, how congested they are with business, and how necessary it is that we be given an additional judge to clear up the congestion. I am not asking it simply because it means more patronage and that we will have another judge. It is because the lawyers have come and told me that it is absolutely necessary. I shall therefore offer an amendment, which I did not have an opportunity to offer to the committee, and I ask that the Senate favorably consider giving New Jersey an additional judge. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and move its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 10, line 13, after the word "two," insert the words "for the district of New Jersey, one" and a semicolon.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator a question or two. He has impressed me very greatly by what he has said as to the necessity of another judge in New Jersey. I am impressed also by what other Senators have said, and I have some knowledge regarding conditions. I think the Senator must realize, and I believe we will all have to realize, that justice in the United States courts is becoming expensive. I wonder what the result would be to the taxpayers if we give an additional judge to every place which makes a good showing, as the Senator has made one, and there are quite a large number of districts which could make a showing almost as good as that which the Senator has made. I wonder what the result will be if we go on increasing the number of judges, as it is indicated will be necessary on account of the kind of litigation which is arising. The Senator referred to one case in New Jersey which took five months to try. That was between two great corporations, I assume. Does the Senator mean that the court was actually in session five months, actually engaged in the trial of that case? And what kind of a case was that? What was the nature of it?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think it was a civil suit involving a contract. I do not remember the details of the case; the information was given to me. I know that the Federal courts in New Jersey are very much sought, and that by reason of the fact that New Jersey, under our general corporation laws, has been practically the home of corporations for a time, until some of that business went to other States, many of these large cases have been tried in the Federal courts there, and some very important ones.

Mr. NORRIS. Could the Senator give me any idea as to how much money it cost the taxpayers of the country to try that one case which took five months?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; I can not. Of course, as the Senator knows, I am not a lawyer. I had to secure my information from the bar association and the judges with whom I have conferred. They say that the courts in New Jersey are so overcrowded with important cases that there is an absolute necessity for more assistance for the three judges who are now sitting, and they are judges who sit practically all the time. I know that Judge Rellstab is constantly holding court. Of course, New Jersey is not a very large State, and the center of our courts is practically Trenton or Newark, within an hour of each other. So the lawyers go either to Trenton or to Newark, and there the courts are held. It saves a great deal of expense to the Federal Government by reason of the fact that the overhead is reduced. I can not give any figures as to the present cost to the taxpayers of the Nation of the Federal courts in New Jersey. All I know is that the courts of New Jersey at present are congested and overcrowded, and we are asking for this judge because we need one, and I think, after taking it up with the Attorney General and with the judges in the State, it has been clearly established that three judges can not possibly handle the business there.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there are comparatively few Senators here, and I know the difficulty of securing a quorum this late in the day. I believe there ought to be more Senators here before the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey is voted upon. I move, therefore, that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator withhold that motion a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I withhold the motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will not move a recess, but will move an adjournment. There was a resolution pending to-day, which is fresh in the minds of all Senators, and there is no use letting grass grow around it before it is discussed again. So I hope that we can enter into a unanimous-consent agreement that to-morrow it may come up, and that then the Senator will move an adjournment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the resolution is on the calendar, and it will have to be taken up by motion. Why not get rid of this court bill and get it out of the way?

Mr. HARRISON. A unanimous-consent agreement has been entered into to vote at a certain time on the judges bill, so there is no question but that the bill will be passed on Friday at 4 o'clock. If the Senator from Iowa will withhold his motion, I would like to submit a unanimous-consent request before that motion is made.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am willing to withhold the motion long enough for a unanimous-consent agreement to be entered into.

Mr. HARRISON. I present a unanimous consent request that to-morrow morning, on the convening of the Senate, the first order of business shall be the consideration of the resolution I have offered and which was pending to-day, and that not more than an hour and a half of discussion shall be had upon the proposition before the vote is taken.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator will make that one-half hour, I think he will have no trouble in getting his agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. One-half hour, providing I can get the floor.

Mr. MOSES. Let there be no proviso about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that he should not ask for the consideration of his resolution until it is seen at least that those who desire to discuss the judicial bill have had an opportunity to do so. It is now agreed that we shall vote upon it at not later than 4 o'clock on Friday.

I presume there are half a dozen or a dozen amendments, and I hope that those amendments may be debated and disposed of before we reach the time for the final vote. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] just reminds me that there are 16 amendments. I think it is not fair to Senators who are proposing amendments to the judicial bill to take any time out of the period from now until 4 o'clock on Friday to devote to some other subject. That is the reason why I moved for a recess rather than an adjournment.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to interfere with the plans of the Senator, but when the first unanimous-consent request was made to-day it was to vote to-morrow at 4 o'clock, and I objected to that, so we could get more time. It was then put over until 4 o'clock on Friday. There will be ample time for consideration of the judges bill. The resolution that was up to-day will be disposed of one way or the other. I have no disposition to prolong the debate on it. I will consent to a half hour's discussion or an hour and a half to-morrow, but let us have action upon it.

Mr. MOSES. I understand that the resolution is pending with a motion to refer it to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. CURTIS. No; the resolution, I understand, is on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. MOSES. Did it not go to the calendar at 2 o'clock?

Mr. LENROOT. Was not the motion to take from the table and refer, and that was divided, and so the motion to take from the table was never acted upon by the Senate?

Mr. HARRISON. It is now before the Senate, as I understand.

Mr. MOSES. The motion to take from the table was carried.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I am mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. True; and the Chair announced that the morning hour having expired when the resolution coming over from the previous day had been under discussion, it went to the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. My unanimous-consent request, if granted, might expedite all this matter and save confusion, so I ask unanimous consent that upon the convening of the Senate to-morrow the resolution be taken up for discussion, and that not more than one hour and a half of debate——

Mr. MOSES. I thought the Senator was going to make it one-half hour?

Mr. HARRISON. One-half hour, if I can be given the half hour.

Mr. MOSES. I shall not object, if we can then take a vote on the disposition of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa withhold his motion for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing to withhold my motion, but I must object to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Curtis	Harrison	McNary
Ball	Dial	Heflin	Moses
Broussard	du Pont	Jones, Wash.	Nelson
Bursum	Ernst	Kendrick	New
Cameron	Fletcher	Keyes	Norris
Capper	France	King	Oddie
Caraway	Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Overman
Cummins	Harris	McKinley	Pepper
Phipps	Sheppard	Spencer	Warren
Poindexter	Shields	Sterling	Watson, Ga.
Rawson	Shortridge	Townsend	Weller

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of absent Senators, and the following Senators answered to their names when called:

Sutherland Wadsworth

Mr. CALDER entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Watson, Ind. Gooding Fernald

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the further execution of the order of the Senate by the Sergeant at Arms be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a motion to take a recess.

Mr. HARRISON. A motion to adjourn has preference over a motion to take a recess, but I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, no business has been transacted since the last call for a quorum.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes. I submit that at least three orders of business have been transacted. The Senator from Iowa moved to dispense with the order under the call to send out and request the attendance of absent Senators——

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. And a motion to adjourn has been voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fernald	McNary	Shields
Ball	Fletcher	Moses	Shortridge
Broussard	France	Nelson	Smoot
Bursum	Frelinghuysen	New	Spencer
Calder	Gooding	Norbeck	Stanley
Cameron	Harris	Norris	Sterling
Capper	Harrison	Oddie	Sutherland
Caraway	Heflin	Overman	Townsend
Cummins	Kendrick	Pepper	Underwood
Curtis	Keyes	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Dial	La Follette	Rawson	Warren
du Pont	Lenroot	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Ernst	McKinley	Sheppard	Watson, Ind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I again ask unanimous consent that on the convening of the Senate to-morrow the Senate Resolution 258, which was under consideration to-day, may be taken up immediately, and that after one hour of discussion a vote thereupon be taken.

Mr. MOSES. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINS. I raise the point of order that the motion to adjourn is not in order, because a motion to take a recess was pending at the time the Senator from Mississippi formerly made his motion to adjourn. He can not make another motion to adjourn, because it would be purely dilatory.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I submit that since the motion to adjourn was made and voted down there has been a quorum call, there has been other business transacted, and that a motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. MOSES. What other business has been transacted—the Senator's request?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from New Hampshire has just objected to a request for unanimous consent which I made.

Mr. MOSES. Poor business that, Mr. President, I will say.

Mr. HARRISON. That may be true, in the opinion of the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the motion is in order, it puts the Senate into the power not of a few men but of one man. I do not believe that a motion to adjourn can be made under these circumstances.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that the Senate adjourn, to which the point of order has been raised that it is dilatory. The Chair has not any doubt about that, and he does not think the Senator from Mississippi has any doubt; but the present occupant of the Chair dislikes to introduce a new rule that he has never yet seen enforced, although he would be very glad to do it.

Mr. SMOOT. Was there any question before the Senate at the time the Senator from Mississippi made his motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] moved to take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and the Senator from Mississippi moved to take an adjournment. Then the point of order was raised and a quorum was called for and developed; several votes were taken; and now, after his request for unanimous consent has been refused, the Senator from Mississippi makes another motion to adjourn. The Chair is inclined to put the motion. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory, and that no business has been transacted since the last call for a quorum was made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MOSES. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit that intervening business has been transacted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to lay on the table the appeal of the Senator from Mississippi from the decision of the Chair. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those in favor of the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire will rise and stand until counted. [A pause.] Those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The appeal from the decision of the Chair is laid on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, I suggest the absence of a quorum upon the count which was made on the division.

Mr. LENROOT. I make the point of order that no business has intervened since a quorum was developed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. Upon the count as announced by the Presiding Officer there is not a quorum present.

Mr. LENROOT. The Chair did not announce the result of the count, so far as I am aware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had already announced that there was a quorum present.

Mr. HARRISON. I refer to the last count on the division. I ask for another division to see if there is a quorum present.

The Senate again divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the second division 32 Senators have voted in favor of the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire and 14 have voted against it.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. STERLING and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. May not the Presiding Officer count Senators who are in their seats but are not voting on this question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not feel disposed to do that.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	Nelson	Smoot
Ball	Freilinghuysen	New	Spencer
Broussard	Gooding	Norbeck	Stanley
Bursum	Harris	Oddie	Sterling
Calder	Harrison	Overman	Sutherland
Cameron	Heflin	Pepper	Townsend
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Underwood
Caraway	Kendrick	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Cummins	Keyes	Pomerene	Warren
Curtis	La Follette	Rawson	Watson, Ga.
du Pont	Lenroot	Reed	Watson, Ind.
Ernst	McKinley	Sheppard
Fernald	McNary	Shields
Fletcher	Moses	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. HARRISON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the question now is upon my motion to take a recess, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HARRISON. I move, as a substitute, that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LENROOT. I make the point of order that a motion to adjourn to a given time is not privileged over a motion to take a recess.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit that it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand seconded? [A pause.] Not a sufficient number have seconded the demand. The motion is lost.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the other side be counted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. MOSES. A point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A demand for the yeas and nays was made, and the Chair stated that it was not supported.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. As it takes one-fifth of the membership present to obtain the yeas and nays, I ask the Chair how many Senators raised their hands?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eight.

Mr. HARRISON. And how many were against it?

Mr. MOSES. That has nothing to do with it. It takes one-fifth of those present to call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was counting according to the roll call that was just had.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for a division upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CURTIS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for a division on the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those in favor of that motion will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no."

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those in favor of the motion will rise.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those opposed will rise.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, what is the vote on the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote as counted by the Chair is 41 to 14; so the motion is agreed to, and the Senate stands in recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Thereupon (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, April 6, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 5, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, may the day be to us a message from the changeless heart of God to the changing heart of man. Let us enjoy life at its best and give the life of joy to others. Talk in whispers to our listening hearts. Send messages of happiness to all our homes and make for all feet a new earth and a new heaven for all weary eyes. Forgive our failures and help us to an increasing mastery over self. With unfaltering faith and courage endow us, and thus may we take our part in the furtherance of good will among all men and in upholding free and righteous government. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the particular phase of the bill H. R. 10329 relating to the abolition of land offices.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves to suspend further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, presented for printing, under the rule, a conference report on the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and sundry independent bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN UNDESIRABLE ALIENS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I call up the bill H. R. 11118, to provide for the deportation of certain undesirable aliens.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Union Calendar and automatically the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MCARTHUR] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11118, with Mr. MCARTHUR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11118, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11118) to provide for the deportation of certain undesirable aliens.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to deport certain undesirable aliens and to deny readmission to those deported," approved May 10, 1920, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(4) All aliens who may after this subdivision takes effect be convicted of any violation or conspiracy to violate any of the following acts, the judgment on such conviction having become final, but no such alien shall be deported until the termination of his imprisonment, if any, upon such conviction:

"(a) The national prohibition act of October 28, 1919;

"(b) The act entitled 'An act to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes,' approved December 17, 1914, as amended;

"(c) Any other statute of the United States, or of a State or Territory, prohibiting or regulating the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, or of opium, coca leaves, or any salt, derivative, or preparation of opium or coca leaves."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the bill presented for your consideration by the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization—unanimously presented—is short and to the point. It provides for the deportation, if the Secretary of Labor so orders by his warrant, after hearing, of those aliens in the United States who may be convicted of violations of the Federal liquor and narcotic acts, and for the violation and conviction after serving sentence of those convicted under State laws of violations of narcotic and liquor acts.

We continually hear it said throughout the United States in regard to alien offenders, "Why not deport them?" The report presented to this bill has the deportation clause of the Burnett Immigration Act, which is the basic immigration law. The deportation clause is section 19 of that law.

It provides that—except as hereinafter provided, any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude, committed within five years after the entry of the alien to the United States, or who is hereafter sentenced more than once to such a term of imprisonment because of conviction in this country of any crime involving moral turpitude, committed at any time after entry—

And so forth. Those are the moral turpitude clauses. This bill presented to this committee is in the nature of an amendment to an act approved May 10, 1920, which act, if the Members of the House will remember, was one which was passed to make certain the deportation of certain alien enemies and certain interned alien enemies. That act of May 10, 1920, provided eight classifications of those who might be deported in addition to the general provisions of the moral turpitude deportation clause which I have mentioned.

That act begins—and I call your attention to this—

That aliens of the following classes, in addition to those for whose expulsion from the United States provision is made in the existing law, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into his custody and deported in the manner provided in sections 19 and 20 of the act of February 5, 1917, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States," if the Secretary of Labor, after hearing, finds that such aliens are undesirable residents of the United States.

All this bill now before you does is to add three further classifications to the specially enumerated deportation clauses, to give the Secretary the opportunity, if he so desires and finds, to proceed on a warrant against aliens convicted of violations of the acts mentioned here and the State acts on the same subject.

The committee after hearings has come to the conclusion that the United States has gone far enough with violations of the narcotic act; for instance, by aliens in this country, who are filling up the jails in some places, and in other places paying fines and not being sentenced to imprisonment; but in the West, where there has been great trouble with alien narcotic violators the judges have finally come to giving them terms of imprisonment—one year, two years, five years, seven years—for violations of the narcotic act. By the enactment of legislation of this kind we want to make certain that at the conclusion of their sentences of imprisonment the Secretary of Labor may and probably will proceed against them and cause their deportation. It is not believed that the passage of this act will make it necessary to run deportations down to misdemeanor violations of the liquor act of the State; but if an alien is arrested for violation of State liquor acts and convicted over and over again, and thereby proves himself to be an undesirable alien, and the Secretary proceeds against him as an undesirable alien, and after hearing as provided by law orders him deported, you may be very certain that he will be an undesirable alien. That is the extent of this law.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman answer just one question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. For the benefit of a number of people who are making the inquiry just at this time, will the chairman of the committee tell us about how many aliens have left the United States since the 3 per cent law went into effect? I have had a number of inquiries come to my office in the last week.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The exact figures are available but not at my fingers' ends this minute. For the year prior to the beginning of the 3 per cent act the net increase of aliens into the United States was 500,000.

Mr. BLANTON. I wish to know the number of those leaving the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For eight months of the year following the act the increase was about 40,000 net. Our inquiry, however, proves the fact that many go out of the country to seek relatives to bring them in. Further inquiry develops the fact that when times are hard in the United States there are many people who have come here to work who go out of the United States.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves 52 minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 249. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to donate and grant certain buildings in Alaska to the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN UNDESIRABLE ALIENS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. I desire recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from California opposed to the bill?

Mr. RAKER. I am not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin opposed to the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any member of the committee desire recognition in opposition to the bill? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is opposed to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill if enacted in the form in which it is reported would delegate to the States the right and power of determining what aliens should be allowed to remain within their borders, because section (c) provides that if any alien is convicted of the violation of any State statute prohibiting or regulating the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, or of opium, and so forth, then the Secretary of Labor, under the mandatory provision of section 19 of the so-called Burnett Act, would be compelled to deport him.

The gentleman reporting this bill glosses over the main objections and tries to represent to this House that a person can be deported only after the violation of either the national prohibition enforcement act or a State prohibition act on successive occasions. I deny it. I claim that if any person is convicted of a violation of either the national prohibition act or any State prohibition act, convicted of one offense, then it is the duty of the Secretary of Labor to deport him immediately under the provisions of section 19 of the Burnett Act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How can the Secretary do that?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because you authorize him to do so in your bill; because you provide in section 1 that the act of May 10, 1920, is amended by adding a new section. Here is the act of May 10, 1920. It is now a dead letter, because it applies entirely to violations of war statutes. That is shown in the report, which will be found on pages 1 and 2, where you enumerate specifically the provision whereby the alien may be deported for violation of various war acts of Congress. Under section 19 of the so-called Burnett Act the alien could be deported after conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude committed within five years of his admission to the country; he may be deported if he is found guilty after conviction for a second offense regardless of the time limit.

Now you propose to out-Volstead VOLSTEAD by providing that for a violation of either a national prohibition act or a State prohibition act for the first offense, whether committed within five years or after five years of his coming here, not involving moral turpitude, he shall be deported under the provisions of the general law—and after, as the gentleman from Maine says, serving out his term of imprisonment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman understand that the act of 1920 is mandatory on the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

Mr. CRAMTON. That in every case the Secretary of Labor has no discretion except to issue the warrant?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the practice under existing law. I now call the attention of the House in reply to the gentleman from Washington and in reply to the gentleman from Michigan to the authority of the Secretary of Labor to mandatorially deport any alien convicted of a first offense of a violation of any prohibition law.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me finish.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to be sure that the gentleman has my question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me proceed, and I will get the gentleman's question afterwards. This is what we are attempting to amend as found on the first page of the report. Permit me to read it:

That aliens of the following classes, in addition to those for whose expulsion from the United States provision is made in the existing law, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into his custody and deported in the manner provided in sections 19 and 20 of the act of February 5, 1917, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States," if the Secretary of Labor, after hearing, finds that such aliens are undesirable residents of the United States.

Then it enumerates various offenses, mostly offenses involving a violation of war acts which are a dead letter to-day, and now it is proposed to add as a new section to that act paragraph 4 of this bill. Under section 19 of the so-called Burnett Act, the act of February 5, 1917, which you will find printed at the bottom of page 2 and most of page 3, the power of the Secretary of Labor has to deport aliens who have been convicted of crime involving moral turpitude within five years after the entry of the alien into the United States, or who has been sentenced more than once to a term of imprisonment because of a crime involving moral turpitude.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does not the act of 1920 expressly provide that in addition to the conviction the Secretary of Labor shall find after hearing that the person is an undesirable person in the United States?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Then it is not mandatory because they are convicted of a violation of a statute.

Mr. STAFFORD. It leaves it to the Secretary of Labor to find if he has been convicted.

Mr. VAILE. It authorizes him to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well; I am unwilling to vest in the Secretary of Labor that great authority to deport an alien who has been convicted for the first time of a violation of a State statute or a national statute involving the prohibition laws of the country. I can conceive of instances where in homes—and every Member representing a foreign constituency can conceive of a case, where younger people have become citizens and there happens to be an old member of the family, a parent who has not been able to take out citizenship papers, being convicted or fined for the manufacture of beer or light wine—and how many thousands of instances in the country where these foreigners are making their wine or beer—and yet the Secretary of Labor would be authorized to deport the father, to break the ties that bind the family, and send him back to a foreign country from which he may have been separated for many, many years.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. The gentleman has drawn a horrible picture of this ogre, the Secretary of Labor, the President's chief adviser, and I want to ask the gentleman if he really believes that any Secretary of Labor, the President's most trusted adviser, is going to use the power conferred on him to deport a man for a trifling act?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am unwilling to vest any such authority in any Cabinet officer. I do not want to take any chances with any future administration calling to the enforcement of this act a man who is as fanatical as some men in this Chamber in the enforcement of the prohibition law.

Mr. VAILE. So the gentleman would not be willing to take a chance?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not. I believe it is better to protect the rights of these aliens who are not guilty of any violation of law involving moral turpitude, but who are just merely guilty of a minor violation of a State statute or a national statute. You do not give him even a chance after he has been convicted the first time. You say to the Secretary of Labor that he may deport the man. In northern Wisconsin, in the district represented by my colleague [Mr. A. P. NELSON]—and he is one of the driest of the dry, and I go into those northern woods every summer because of hay-fever trouble—nearly every one of the farmers are manufacturing their home wine and home brew. Are you going to allow some State prohibition officer to go and arrest a man who does that, and are you going to put the authority in the Secretary of Labor to deport that man, when, under existing law, you permit aliens committing murder, rape, and the most heinous offenses after five years' residence to remain here?

I say that you are going too far in your exercise of autocratic power. You judge a law by the extreme cases and you want to test it by the extreme cases, and I certainly protest against such an unreasonable enactment of law.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In reference to the question asked by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE], to the effect that this act as proposed to be amended does not give the Secretary of Labor discretion merely, but makes it his duty to deport anyone who may have been convicted; it says that he shall be deported. So there is no discretion in the Secretary of Labor. Upon its being brought to his attention that some alien has been convicted, it becomes his mandatory duty to deport him.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am glad that the gentleman called my attention to it.

Paragraph 4 states:

All aliens who may after this subdivision takes effect be convicted of any violation or conspiracy to violate any of the following acts, the judgment on such conviction having become final, but no such alien shall be deported until the termination of his imprisonment, if any, upon such conviction.

Now, gentlemen, there was reported just a few days ago a very well considered bill relating to the——

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at present. There was reported just a few days ago a very well considered bill relating to the manufacture and control of narcotics from the Committee on Ways and Means, by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY], wherein there is a provision providing for the deportation of those who have been convicted of violation of the narcotic act. But this bill goes to extremes, goes beyond anything that the Congress of the United States has ever passed, and violates, in my opinion, the fundamental principles of giving protection to the homes of the people when they commit no crime involving moral turpitude but are guilty of only an infraction of a punitory statute.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the chairman of the committee, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this committee has given a great deal of consideration to this subject. The chairman of the committee is always active and energetic in trying to get proper legislation, and he allows no other Member of the House or other committee to excel him in the work, to the end that the Members of the House may know what is going on, as well as the country generally, and he not only believes in enforcing the law, but believes in allowing those who are handsome and beautiful to appear before the committee and give their judgment, so that the Members of the House and the country may know. Therefore I desire to have the Clerk read in my time a clipping that appeared yesterday in a newspaper, after which I will proceed with this particular question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FAIR LILLIAN VERSUS JOHN L.

John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, held the center of the stage in the capacious House Labor Committee room this morning, while Chairman JOHN I. NOLAN smiled at the crowds which filled rooms, corridors, and intervening spaces.

Along came Chairman ALBERT JOHNSON, of the Immigration Committee.

"I can beat that crowd all to smithereens," he whispered with a grin as he sent a notice to the press galleries for posting.

The notice read: "Lillian Russell, President Harding's European commissioner, will be present in person at the House Immigration Committee hearings Thursday morning at 10.30."

And now they say that Congressman WALLACE WHITE, of the Committee on Woman Suffrage, is preparing to negotiate with Rudolph Valentino to tell what he knows about California women voters.

[Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Gentlemen, speaking of this bill, I think the criticisms made by the gentleman from Wisconsin——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. What particular language of this bill does the newspaper clipping have reference to?

Mr. RAKER. That relates to another bill pending, showing that the chairman of the committee is always active.

One of the things is not necessarily punishment but deterrent, and when a man is convicted under the narcotic laws of the Federal Government, or under the State laws, or convicted under the act of October 28, 1919, or under the State laws regarding the sale of narcotics, or violating the prohibition law, and he is an alien, and after he has served his term of imprisonment, if there is a term of imprisonment, he can be arrested by the immigration authorities and given full hearings—the evidence will show his conviction—and in addition to that, under the act as it is now in existence, the Secretary of Labor must find that such alien is an undesirable resident of the United States.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. For a question.

Mr. MILLS. Has the committee any evidence to submit to the House of the need for such a law?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. We think so. I will explain it.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman tell us whether there is any evidence that the Volstead law is being violated?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Now, that being the case, an alien who realizes, and it has been realized—we have amended the narcotic law, and that was the purpose of the Harrison amendment, to take charge of those and dispose of them who had been convicted already two or three times, and we cut so much out of it that there is no chance of getting anything out of it. But under the narcotic act you could keep a man in jail some time without putting him on the community to commit another crime. The same way with the liquor enforcement.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman think that an alien that violates the prohibition law is any more an undesirable citizen than a native citizen who violates it?

Mr. RAKER. My dear sir, it is shown, because there is a statutory provision, except in a certain instance, that the court can deprive him of his citizenship. If a man deliberately and premeditatedly as an alien of this country came here, when we have a constitutional amendment conducted by practically all the States, practically all except one, when all the States have that kind of a law, and when this Congress by an overwhelming vote of both Houses passed it over the President's veto—when the American people have a law of that kind and people come to our country to receive its benefits and pleasures and opportunities, and they deliberately violate that law, because the punishment is so small that they will go back to it again, they do not belong here. The day will come when these persistent violators, these bootleggers in our country, if they continue, will compel the States to pass laws by which those citizens will not be permitted to come in them.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, this bill is not confined to the bootlegger, where, if I understand, there is quite a diversity of opinion throughout the country as to the moral turpitude involved, but, as a matter of fact, this bill does seek at the same time to cover something that every normal man and woman in the United States is altogether interested in, and that is the suppression of the infractions of the Harrison Act.

Mr. RAKER. All right. Now, these are twins from hell itself, and liquor and narcotic drugs go together, and have from the beginning of time.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Would not the gentleman's argument apply equally to the aliens who violate any other statute of the United States?

Mr. RAKER. No; and for this reason——

Mr. FAIRCHILD. How about the postal laws of the United States, where obscene literature is sent through the mails? Would it apply to that?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; that is a crime involving moral turpitude.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. How about counterfeiting?

Mr. RAKER. That is a crime involving moral turpitude.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Does it apply to that?

Mr. RAKER. It applies to all such cases. To-day if you convict a man of a crime involving moral turpitude, you can deport him, but the decisions up to the present time have been to the effect that a man convicted of violation of the prohibition law is not guilty of a crime involving moral turpitude.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Then, if you are seeking to punish crimes not involving moral turpitude, why not make this act apply to all such cases?

Mr. RAKER. We can not do everything at once. We have these two evils which have stalked through the world from the beginning of time, and the people of this country are trying to do away here with the sale and distribution of narcotic drugs. The people of this country have been trying also to do away with the liquor evil. Therefore we have selected these two because they work hand in hand, and you can not separate one from the other, and it is a good thing to pack them right up and deal with them together. As the testimony shows, from 50 to 90 per cent of the men who violate the narcotic laws and the prohibition laws are aliens.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Does not the gentleman understand that when you single out one or two statutes in this manner you, by implication, invite violations of all other statutes?

Mr. RAKER. No. We ought, by deporting these people, to give them an example that no more aliens living in this country who desire to receive the benefits of living in this country shall be allowed to violate the law, and then they will begin to say, "I will not violate it, because if I do I will not only get an imprisonment judgment but I will be sent back to the old country." Let me tell you not many of them will take the chances of that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Can these people be deported from the State of California?

Mr. RAKER. My dear friend, do you not know that these aliens in California who have been debauching our country in the way of the narcotic trade, these Chinese, are violating the law to such an extent that for years we have been trying to get a better and more wholesome condition of affairs, and——

Mr. WALSH. How many of these are there in California?

Mr. RAKER. I do not know. We have tried to get a census, and we have not been able to get it.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment. I read from the hearings:

Mr. RAKER. Just let me ask you this question: Would it be material as to the percentage or as to the exact number if, as a matter of fact, there is a persistent and determined effort on the part of aliens to violate these laws?

Mr. JONES. I would not say that it is material, whether it is 50 per cent or whether it is 80 per cent.

Mr. RAKER. The good result obtained by the example of not only the punishment or the fine but the finality of the judgment, followed by deportation, would deter these people and make them believe we mean business when we pass a law.

Mr. JONES. You have expressed my view on it, Mr. Congressman, better than I could myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to answer the gentleman's question. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the deportation of any unnaturalized foreign-born person, any alien, who may be convicted of a violation of the national prohibition act of October 28, 1919, the Volstead Act, or—

(c) Any other statute of the United States, or of a State or Territory, prohibiting or regulating the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

And so forth. Aliens are to be deported, not only for violating a Federal statute but for violating a State law.

To subject aliens to deportation under this bill it is not necessary that they shall be convicted by a court of record or after a jury trial. Even a police court conviction or a conviction by a justice of the peace will provide the required basis for their deportation.

Aliens so convicted are not merely deported without other punishment. The deportation is in addition to such punishment as may be given them by the courts convicting them. After they serve out their sentences or pay their fines they are then to be deported; that is, are to be sent back to the foreign land in which they may have been born.

The bill provides for a double punishment for a crime—punishment by the court which tries the alien and punishment by the Bureau of Immigration which deports him; punishment by fine and imprisonment in this country and then by banishment to some foreign land from which perhaps the alien fled to save his life. The bill discriminates between American citizens who violate our laws and aliens who violate them. The citizen expiates his offense by fine and imprisonment. The alien for the same offense is not only fined and imprisoned but is then banished for life.

THE HIGH-WATER MARK OF INTOLERANCE.

This bill, it seems to me, marks the high tide of fanaticism and intolerance. Section 19 of the immigration act of 1917 went far beyond anything that had previously been conceived in this country in so far as deportation is concerned. The proposal now is to extend the deportation provisions of the act of 1917 to persons who may be guilty of violating the prohibition laws, not merely the Federal prohibition laws, but the prohibition laws of any State.

I speak on this subject as one who has been a prohibitionist from boyhood, but not, as I hope, a fanatical prohibitionist, who has nothing in his mind except prohibition. I do not expect prohibition alone to save the world. But I am not willing to deport a man from the United States for violating a police statute such as the prohibition law, when I would not deport him if he had violated some law of more importance and involving more serious consequences.

WHEN FANATICISM AND UNREASON RUN RIOT.

Bear in mind that the act of 1917 fixes the period at five years after a man comes to the United States within which a man must have committed the offense for which he may be deported. Here there is no time limit. The alien may have lived here until he has raised up American-born grandchildren to manhood, and then, forsooth, because fanaticism and unreason run riot in Congress, he is to be banished to a land which he may not have seen for 50 years. And all this not for treason or plotting against the State, not for murder or theft, but merely because he is found with a flask of liquor in his pocket or is at an assemblage where forbidden liquors are consumed.

PUSHES INTO FIELD OF HYPOCRISY.

This bill not only reaches the limit of unreason but pushes into the field of hypocrisy. I say that with all deliberation. It would be indelicate for me to refer to Members of Congress or to officials of the Government, but let us refer to other men in prominent stations in society. Let us refer to the classes of wealth, prestige, and accredited culture who constitute the dominant elements in the United States. Let me ask you, gentlemen, how many of them have been guilty of violating the prohibition laws of the Federal Government or of some of the States. Many of them have their private cellars; they are the customers of the bootleggers and the rum runners; they are the "hooch hounds." They laugh at the prohibition laws. Do they deserve exile?

Let us look at this matter like sensible and honest men, and, above all, like courageous men. Will you say that an alien who sits down at a table where wine is served and perhaps drinks some of it himself—will you say that it is such a serious offense that he should be banished to some land where perhaps disorder, starvation, and ruin prevail, when you yourselves, it may be, some of you, have been guilty of a similar delinquency? If you have not been guilty I congratulate you. I want to say that some of the leaders in this land have done such things. At a recent social occasion, held in the city of Washington, and attended by some of the most prominent men in America, liquors were openly served, so I am reliably informed.

Let me say, in further amplification of the question I asked the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], that the alien who commits an offense does not become thereby more undesirable than the American who commits the same offense. It is the utmost of intolerance and unreason that would mete out to him a different measure of punishment.

My position upon the subject of immigration is well known. I have voted for every measure proposed in this House which would restrict immigration. I will vote to shut the doors of this country in the faces of undesirable aliens; but the time to deal with them as foreigners is before they enter, not after they are here. When an alien leaves his native land and puts his foot upon the soil of the United States, the flag reaches out over him, and the Constitution, not merely in its letter but in its spirit as the founders of the Republic conceived it, should grant him every protection.

EXILE AS A PUNISHMENT FOR CRIME.

I am not willing, because a wave of intolerance and Chauvinism has swept over us, to punish by double penalties a man who commits a crime. I am not willing to punish any crime by banishment. You would deport the alien merely because the Constitution permits his deportation. It does not permit the deportation of a citizen who is a criminal, no matter how bad he may be. The same extreme and intolerant spirit that would deport the alien would banish the American if only it were constitutional to do so. The same spirit that lies behind this bill would drive into foreign exile those who are in opposition to those who are in the ascendency. It is un-American; it is unworthy. We ought not to go to any such extreme. There is no occasion for it.

The spirit of intolerance which animates the bill under consideration is the same spirit which brooks no difference of opinion. It would stifle freedom of speech and of press. It would deny the right of citizens to meet together. It would correct by thumbscrew and rack all errors of religious opinion. The disposition to deport an alien for the violation of the prohibition law and yet which would condone and laugh at the offense when committed by an American citizen is the spirit of persecution rampant. It would crucify all independent minds which did not bow to it. Had it the power, it would banish native-born Americans who did not speak and think and walk in the fashion the majority might hold was proper.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Where would the gentleman deport an American citizen?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. To the same place that you would deport an alien who has lived here for 50 years and lost his citizenship in his native country. Where will you deport the alien to? He has become a man without a country. Will you send him to Russia? Will you deport him to Africa? Where are you going to send him? He knows nobody in the foreign country. It is not his country. You can not compel that country to receive him back. Perhaps if received back he would be promptly crucified. Would you send a Czarist back to be executed in soviet Russia? Is that within the spirit of the gentleman's intention? Would he send a proscribed Irishman back to Ireland to be hanged? Would he send an Armenian back to Turkish murderers?

Oh, the matter of not having anywhere to send the man is an unimportant detail that should give the fanatics little pause. Why not take his life for the difference in opinion? The same spirit of intolerance, the same spirit of fanaticism which would lead you to banish a man to some land where, perhaps, his life would be forfeited, where starvation would grip him, where disease and disaster would overtake him, that same spirit would send him to the gallows for the same offense or send him to ruin and death in any other shape.

Mr. WURZBACH. Is it not a fact that this law would also include within its terms a person who had declared his intention to become an American citizen and who had taken out his first papers?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Oh, certainly; and that irrespective of the length of time that he has lived in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in my section of the country there are not many aliens. We are not bothered much with the alien immigration question. However, I see in the hearings on this bill a declaration from parties in power and engaged in the enforcement of the law that over 50 per cent of the violators of the narcotic and liquor laws are aliens. Anyone who has ever had any experience in the enforcement of the law knows that that can be accounted for by the fact that to a great portion of the immigrants who come to this country our jails are a promotion and have no horrors for them. I know men who will deliberately walk out and commit another crime after being freed from jail, because the jail has no horror for them or for men of their class. They are aliens. They have no notion of ever becoming citizens of the United States. I have not much patience with the theory that we should not return them to the country from whence they came for fear something terrible would be done to them there. I remember one case in which a former Assistant Secretary of Labor refused to deport a Mexican anarchist. While it was admitted that he was an anarchist and was trying to do all kinds of injury to this country, a former Assistant Secretary of Labor would not deport him to Mexico for fear they would destroy his life there. Well, there might be worse things happen to civilization than the destruction of that life.

The statement has been made that the law we are amending is a dead letter. I challenge that statement. The law is not a dead letter. There are portions of the law living to-day. The gentleman called attention to certain crimes and said why not include those crimes. Those crimes are included, because they have been held to involve moral turpitude, and the same power you are giving the Secretary of Labor over these crimes in this amendment to the bill to-day is now pertaining to the very crimes the gentleman mentions.

If there are any crimes peculiar to certain foreigners it is those crimes, and I say to you that the enforcement of the narcotic act has been thwarted and disturbed more by the alien population in this country than any other and the redemption of which there is no possibility. They ought to be deported, they ought to be sent back. Any man who thinks that a jail is a palace ought to be deported from the country if he is not a citizen to the place from which he came. Every law has a reasonable and sensible enforcement, and there will not be any isolated cases like the picking up of the old gentleman my friend mentioned in the north woods where he goes hunting. The men that will be deported under this amendment are the men that are filling the jails of this country to-day to such an extent that the dockets of the courts are congested and cases can not be tried because of that congestion. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I am in full sympathy with this measure and the purpose of it. I have no sympathy for an alien who has been here 50 years and has not become a citizen. [Applause.] You will not find much Americanism in such men. We have too many of that kind now. This bill adds two offenses to a long list already in the law the convictions for which authorize the deportation of aliens. Among them is Bolshevism. There is need of putting out of the country those who are not in sympathy with American institutions—men who go around and preach the subversion of the Constitution of the country and in a hidden way trying to destroy the ideals of American life. I naturally expect when that spirit is abroad in the land to find measures like this meeting with hostility. The man who comes here and violates the law is not the kind of a man that America needs now. It is a shame that we have too many of our own people violating the laws. It is a shame that the 20 to 50 per cent of the violations of the narcotic and liquor laws are committed by Americans. I do not understand the spirit of the citizenship that fights this proposition in the face of the fact that the acts denounced violate the provisions of the Constitution. I do not want that kind of spirit to grow in America; there is too much of it now. Lawlessness is all too prevalent. We have come to have too little regard for the authority of law. We need to have some deep-seated genuine respect for what is in the Constitution of the United States and what is written in the statute books. If the ties of society can be weakened at all in America, they can be weakened by this spirit of lawlessness filtering into our life.

The fact that we have a large amount of it among our own people only makes it more dangerous when such men as gentlemen describe come from foreign countries into our life to blur and mar it. I hope that American public sentiment will protect itself. The idea of great hordes who have just arrived in the United States going about loaded down with booze and dope and hooch, which they are peddling. Members of the great body of citizenship, and even some Members of the great House of Congress, think that it is no offense or a trifling one. I wonder if the American people think so. We need not only to purge our life and our Nation from aliens who do that, but we need to purge this thing from the body of American citizenship. We need to get it out of the minds of our own people. I am not afraid of what my brother American will do who in his own heart loves the law. If he is an upstanding man of that stock from which free people come, he may divide into factions and fight like the mischief with his brother American, but you will never make a slave of him, you will find him with too much common sense to get him or his country into a pandemonium like France had 125 to 130 years ago, or like Russia has now. He believes in law; he believes in order; he has common sense enough to know that the enjoyment of life can not work out without law. He knows that his opportunity depends upon law and depends upon order. Americanism stands for law, and that is why I am for this bill. I hope it will pass. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, the question has arisen during the debate this afternoon as to the method of deporting aliens. This bill seeks to amend the present laws relating to arresting and deporting aliens, and the regulations now in existence will therefore apply in this case. Officers are required to make thorough investigation of all cases when they are either informed or have reason to believe that a specified alien in the United States is subject to arrest and deportation; an application is filed generally with an inspector of immigration. It must state facts showing prima facie that the alien comes within one or more of the classes subject to deportation after entry, and should be accompanied by some substantial supporting evidence. The application should also be accompanied by the affidavit of the person giving information or by a transcript of a sworn statement taken from that person by an inspector. A warrant is then issued for the arrest of such alien, and he is granted a hearing to enable him to show cause, if any there be, why he should not be deported.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Is that provided in the bill?

Mr. CABLE. That is provided in the regulations on page 75, subdivision 5, of immigration rules 22 dealing with "arrest and deportation on warrant."

Pending determination of the case, in the discretion of the immigration officer in charge, the alien may be taken into custody or allowed to remain in such place deemed by such officer secure and proper. At the beginning of the hearing under the warrant of arrest the alien is allowed to inspect the warrant of arrest, and all the evidence on which it is issued. In addition, the regulation requires and makes it mandatory that he shall be apprised that he may be represented by counsel. His counsel shall be permitted to be present during the conducting of the hearing and to offer evidence to meet any evidence presented or adduced by the Government. A complete record of the testimony, both on behalf of the Government and the alien, shall be prepared and forwarded to the bureau, together with any written argument or brief submitted by counsel, and the recommendation of the examining officer and the officer in charge for determination as to whether or not a deportation warrant shall issue.

Mr. VAILE. And this bill gives him a right to that full hearing?

Mr. CABLE. This bill amends the law and will be administered under the same regulations as govern other deportation cases, providing in each case for a full hearing and to be represented by counsel.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Does the alien under this act have the right to a hearing?

Mr. CABLE. Yes; as I have stated above, a full hearing is afforded him similar to hearing in State courts. After the record, briefs, and recommendation of the examining officer and of the officer in charge reach the bureau, they are referred to the solicitor of the Department of Labor, who again goes over the evidence and the law of the case and makes his recommendation to the chief of his bureau, viz, Commissioner Husband, who, together with the Secretary of Labor, again for the fourth time review the finding and make their determination as to whether or not such alien is a desirable resident.

Mr. BIRD. I believe it is clear that it is not mandatory on the Secretary of Labor to deport, but under the language of the act of 1920 is it not mandatory that he make a case out of every violation?

Mr. CABLE. It is mandatory thus far: If a complaint is filed with the Secretary of Labor, or if he knows of a case that should be investigated, then his men make a thorough investigation and proceed as I have outlined above. Each case will be considered by the Secretary of Labor on its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word precisely on the question which has just been raised, as to whether the deportation provided in this bill is mandatory on the Secretary of Labor. I can do that best by putting the documents together far better than by comment. This bill merely proposes to amend the act of May 10, 1920, by adding certain sections to it. The proposed amendment strikes nothing out of the act of May 10, 1920. The enacting clause and first paragraph of that act read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That aliens of the following classes, in addition to those for whose expulsion from the United States provision is made in the existing law, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into his custody and deported in the manner provided in sections 19 and 20 of the act of February 5, 1917, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States," if the Secretary of Labor, after hearing, finds that such aliens are undesirable residents of the United States, to wit.

They shall be deported from the United States if the Secretary of Labor, after hearing, finds that they are undesirable residents of the United States, and if he does so find they shall be deported under the conditions provided in sections 19 and 20 of the act of February 5, 1917.

I wish to call attention to a proviso of section 19 of the act mentioned. A judge can prevent the Secretary of Labor from taking the case up at all. Here is the language:

Provided further, That the provision of this section respecting the deportation of aliens convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude shall not apply to one who has been pardoned, nor shall such deportation be made or directed if the court or judge thereof sentencing such alien for such crime shall, at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence or within 30 days thereafter, due notice having first been given to the representatives of the State, make a recommendation to the Secretary of Labor that such aliens shall not be deported in pursuance of this act.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that that will apply to this act?

Mr. TEMPLE. This act is an amendment to the act of May 10, 1920, and that act says that the deportation shall be made in the manner provided in sections 19 and 20 of the act of February 5.

Mr. MANN. The act provides for deportation, but that does not carry the exception.

Mr. TEMPLE. The provisions of section 19 are what I read.

Mr. MANN. That is the manner of deportation, but there is no provision about finding that a man shall be deported.

Mr. TEMPLE. The act of May 10, 1920, makes the exception—that is, an amendment to that act—and does not strike out the exception.

Mr. MANN. This is a reference to the Burnett Act.

Mr. TEMPLE. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Yes; it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would like just about 30 seconds more. The act under consideration reads:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to deport certain undesirable aliens and to deny readmission to those deported," approved May 10, 1920, be amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows.

This is expressly an amendment to that act, and that act provides that aliens deported under its provisions shall be deported in accordance with section 19 of the act of 1917. That section, section 19 of the act of 1917, gives the judge authority to stop the whole business before it reaches the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. EVANS. As I understand, the regulations are by this act made part of the law. Is that correct?

Mr. TEMPLE. I do not think so. I would not interpret what the other speakers state, but that is not my understanding.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, apparently the native-born bootleggers of America fear the competition of the alien bootleggers of America, and to-day we have the first piece of legislation offered to this Chamber emanating from the bootleggers' union. I am not surprised that this type of legislation is offered to this House. Were to-day not, however, April 5, I should think that it were the 1st of April.

We stand here to-day looked down upon in this House by the picture of the most distinguished alien who ever sojourned in this country and fought for the cause of liberty. I refer to the Marquis de Lafayette, who fought in cooperation with General Washington.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. In a minute. I will just get through with this, and then I will yield.

In the days of Marquis de Lafayette "deportation" was known as "banishment." The old remedy of the old French monarchy, which was tied up with the Bastille, and which we thought had fallen with the fall of the Bastille, is now invoked to protect the native-born members of the bootleggers' union from foreign competition. [Laughter.]

I am inclined to think that this bill will pass, because I hold in my hand general order No. 17, I might say, of the generalissimo of the forces who back this bill, and for the first time to-day I am interested to notice that the bootleggers' union of America is fighting under the banner of the Anti-Saloon League of America. [Laughter.]

I am indebted this morning to some strange chance, because I have never been considered a follower of the Anti-Saloon League of America, and yet as a Member of this House this morning I received orders intended for some of the rest of you.

and in order that you will not miss your orders on this bill I will read the order of the generalissimo of the bootleggers' union of America and the Anti-Saloon League of America, which is as follows.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman reads——

Mr. HILL. I do not care to yield yet.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman if he wants the prohibition laws enforced or not?

Mr. HILL. My views as to the enforcement of the prohibition laws will be taken up later.

Now, lest some Members have failed to read this order, I will read it. I understand some of the Members have received this order. I read:

The Anti-Saloon League of America. Legal department. Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel and legislative superintendent, 30 Bliss Building, Washington, D. C.

I understood yesterday that he was also treasurer of the campaign committee, but he does not put that designation on this order. I read:

APRIL 4, 1922.

MY DEAR SIR: The appropriation bill, H. R. 11065, for the Justice Department as reported by the committee includes a designated sum of $200,000 for special United States assistant attorneys to enforce the national prohibition act. This is the same as last year. The Justice Department estimated that $150,000 additional was needed for clerks, stenographers, assistants, printing, etc., for these assistant attorneys. The committee amendment requires that this amount be taken from the total provided for these general purposes or items of expense.

Now comes the order for the day, the general order for to-day, issued by the combined forces of the bootleggers' union and the Anti-Saloon League of America:

On Wednesday H. R. 10075, to deport aliens who have violated the liquor or narcotic laws, will doubtless be reached for consideration.

Zero hour has struck, my friends. It has been "reached for consideration," and in a few minutes we will see the forces of the Anti-Saloon League and the forces of the bootleggers' union of America going over the top to pass this wonderful bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. There will not be any opposition to the amendment, will there? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. There will be a few. There will be a few of us who believe that George Washington and General Lafayette were the best guides for the American people in the way of deciding upon banishment who will vote against this bill.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Not yet. I read further:

It will help law enforcement to provide for the deportation of such aliens.

Years ago in France, before the Bastille fell, they would have said "banish" such aliens. I read further:

In many places most of the offenders against the liquor and narcotic laws are aliens. There are approximately 8,000,000 aliens in the United States.

Now, my friends, that is the general order for the day. Here is your order for to-morrow or the day after to-morrow.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I can not yield yet. Mark this:

"It has been suggested," says General Wheeler, "that an amendment be added to take away the citizenship of Americans who use neighboring territory as a base for violating the laws of the United States."

I can see that this emanates from the "bootleggers' union, No. 1," located in Washington, and not a border association. [Laughter.] I read further:

Many so-called Americans are using the islands near our shores for liquor-smuggling headquarters. Unless there is some real objection to the amendment its adoption would help to discourage this indefensible practice.

Pass this law to-day, Members of this House, and you will be asked to pass a further law to take away the citizenship of any American who violates the national prohibition law.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. That refers to the other law, does it not?

Mr. HILL. I can not yield. I read further:

I hope you can see your way clear to support these measures in the most effective form.

Yours cordially, W. B. WHEELER.

P. S.—The various wet organizations are becoming active in encouraging beer and wine candidates in districts where Congressmen have supported enforcement legislation. Are there any such candidates in your district? The friends of the eighteenth amendment will do their duty if they are correctly informed.

[Applause.]

I noticed the gentleman cheered, because the gentleman was here yesterday when a promise was held out that those who voted with the Anti-Saloon League should be financed in their campaigns.

Mr. BLANTON. Why should they not be?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. I have not yielded.

The bill provides that all aliens who violate the national prohibition act or State prohibition act shall be deported, whether or not they have had a jail sentence or only a fine, because paragraph 4 says:

All aliens who may after this subdivision takes effect be convicted of any violation or conspiracy to violate any of the following acts, the judgment on such conviction having become final, but no such alien shall be deported until the termination of his imprisonment, if any, upon such conviction.

That means imprisonment or fine.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Not yet.

Mr. LAYTON. I hope the gentleman, who is a neighbor of mine, will yield.

Mr. HILL. Not yet. Now, gentlemen, I shall vote against this measure. I expect to see you pass it, because you have received your orders from the Anti-Saloon League of America. But I say to you that legislation of this kind is the sort of thing that will break down all true endeavor to make this Nation properly temperate instead of fanatically intolerant. Such legislation destroys the foundations of American liberty. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I feel in a fortunate position here to-day, in that never has anyone contributed anything to my campaign fund in 12 years, except one older brother, who has acted the part generously, and two years ago neither I nor anyone else paid one cent of expense for my nomination or election.

In one respect I am in somewhat the same position as my friend from Maryland [Mr. HILL]. Neither one of us makes much distinction between alien and American bootleggers. I do not care whether they are American or alien; I want to put them out of business. The gentleman from Maryland made it plain by his speech that he does not care whether they are American or alien, he does not want to interfere with their business. The gentleman from Maryland complains because in his "general order 17" Mr. Wheeler was insisting upon this bill to put the alien bootlegger out of business, and then he objected to the postscript put in by Mr. Wheeler asking an amendment to put the home bootlegger out of business. The gentleman from Maryland and myself are alike in making no distinction between the alien bootlegger and the American bootlegger, but there we part. I want them both put out of business. [Applause.]

There has been a great attempt to-day to put up a smoke screen around this bill, calling your attention to that which might be in the bill but is not, and saying little about what the bill really does contain. The bill provides that on its passage the Secretary of Labor may hold a hearing with reference to a particular alien who has been convicted of a violation of our law against the sale of intoxicating liquors or narcotics. There is nothing to say that he must hold a hearing; but if he holds a hearing and if the Secretary of Labor, a Federal official of the very highest standing, finds that such alien is an undesirable resident of the United States, then he may issue his warrant for his deportation. From the time the warrant is issued the statute is mandatory and the alien goes his way. He is deported.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I should like to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, it is not better, where the Secretary finds a man to be an undesirable alien, to order his deportation, rather than let the States toss that convicted violator from one State to another in an attempt to put the expense on the other State?

Mr. CRAMTON. I agree with my friend absolutely. I say from that point the law is mandatory, that the undesirable alien must proceed on his way; but until the Secretary of Labor issues his warrant, it is in his discretion; not as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] would like to have you believe, that the whole statute is mandatory, and that any man convicted of a technical violation of the liquor laws would have to be deported no matter how ridiculous it might be.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Unless I can get more time I can not yield. Now, that is the provision of the bill. Is that desirable? If a man comes to this country from abroad, and so persistently, so flagrantly, violates our law against the sale of intoxicating liquor or narcotics as to be found to be an undesirable resident, what shall we do with that man? If he is a citizen, we have no option except to keep him here. We have no other place to send him. But if he is an alien, I say we ought to send him out of the country as undesirable. [Applause.] He does not have the spirit of our American institutions in his heart. If a man is born in this country and has not the spirit of our institutions in his heart, so much the worse for the country. We can not put him out.

But if he comes here from abroad and proves after a period of probation—the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is evidently not a Methodist and does not believe in a period of probation—if this alien comes here from abroad and after a period of probation proves that he is undesirable, that he has not the American spirit in his heart, then I say send him home again, and the sooner the better. What is the American spirit? What is the spirit of our American institutions? Where is it codified? It is codified in the Constitution of the United States. If there is anyone here who in his heart does not subscribe to the Constitution of the United States——

Mr. MACGREGOR. There are a whole lot of them.

Mr. CRAMTON. I hope the gentleman from New York is not one of them.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Certainly not.

Mr. CRAMTON. I hope the gentleman does not stand here where he took his oath of office and say that he does not subscribe to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I do subscribe to it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would like two minutes additional.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Constitution of the United States is a codification of the American spirit, and no one has the right to say that he will subscribe to one part of it and not to another. [Applause.] The eighteenth amendment to the Constitution says that in this country intoxicating liquors shall not be sold, manufactured, or transported. If there are those born in this country, even those in office, who are not willing to see the Constitution of the United States enforced, that is the misfortune of America; but if there are those who come here from foreign lands, where they had no opportunity, who have come to this land of broad opportunity, and they are not willing in return to support the supreme law of the land, the codification of our American spirit, for God's sake send them back where they came from. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, our incomparably handsome, most likable, and genial colleague from Maryland is absolutely sound on every question except one—the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution. He has assumed the leadership of the men in this Nation who are against the enforcement to the letter of that amendment. He stands for beer and light wines. He says that until to-day Wayne Wheeler, the distinguished attorney for the Anti-Saloon League, never dared to send him a communication. But he said that lately, as soon as this bill was framed and brought into the House, Wayne Wheeler has assumed the leadership for the bootleggers' union in this country, and immediately upon assumption of that leadership representing the bootleggers' union, is it strange that our colleague from Maryland should receive orders from Wayne Wheeler? [Laughter.] No, no; why, it is the natural sequence if that is true; if as a matter of fact Wayne Wheeler is representing them he was not far astray in sending orders to our friend from Maryland. [Laughter.]

But I want to say—and I hold no brief for Wayne Wheeler, and I never received one cent in my life from the Anti-Saloon League or any other prohibition organization for campaign expenses—I want to say, in justice to Wayne Wheeler, that if there is a man on God's green earth whom the bootleggers of the country hate, it is Wayne Wheeler. He is the man who has stood in their way; he is the man who is trying to put them out of business; he is the man who is trying to protect the homes of this country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will give me some time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will give the gentleman a half a minute.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know that every bootlegger in the country is the best friend the Volstead law has?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that is because the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin and the distinguished gentleman from Maryland and other distinguished gentlemen who had something to do with the legislation some time ago and since have forced provisions in the Volstead law which permits the bootleggers of the country to violate the law with impunity and receive a 1-cent fine, as was received upon a plea of guilty in my own State just the other day. A violator of the liquor law of the country and the Constitution was fined 1 cent by a Federal judge in Texas. That is what makes the law ridiculous. It should be enforced as every law is enforced.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Does the gentleman suppose that Wayne Wheeler got this judge to be lenient to the bootlegger?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman's question answers itself through its absurdity. Wayne Wheeler stands for the abolition of the saloon and the liquor business of the country. He has done more than any other man in the country to abolish the saloons; he has done more than any other man in the country to protect the young manhood, the boys and girls of the country, and to protect the homes and the firesides; and he is the man whom we ought to commend, whom we ought to hold up in esteem, and not condemn or criticize without some reason for it. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 24 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Washington has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am reminded of the lines in the comic opera, I think "The Mikado," which run something like this:

> My object all sublime, I shall achieve in time,
> To make the punishment fit the crime, the punishment fit the crime.

This is rather a frantic scramble on the part of those who are endeavoring to conserve accommodations in our jails for American citizens, to provide some way of eliminating the foreign bootlegger. Of course, it appeals very strongly to gentlemen from the drastic dry States, such as the Representative from Kansas, where I understand they have become expert in fixing by legislation the length of bed sheets and other chamber linen, and also the Representatives from States from which we have just heard, where its senior Senator recently was called on to write a letter with reference to an organization operating within its borders and point out that unless the State put down the organization the organization would destroy the State.

I am somewhat familiar with the legislation enacted to enforce the prohibition amendment. I believed then as I believe now that we started in with too drastic a law for the enforcement, and to give due meed of praise to the distinguished author of that law I would say that I never heard him urge at that time nor since, nor do I think it occurred to him in his wildest dreams, that we should provide for the deportation of aliens who have violated some provision of a State law with reference to the narcotic or the prohibition laws; but I appreciate the gentlemen on the Pacific coast who have been unable to find out how many of a certain class of aliens there are living in their midst and are greatly terrorized because they are compelled to live in a state of ignorance, and if they gathered them all up in one place they would find that they would not equal the population of some modern-sized city in the United States.

The difficulty out there is that they always find some American citizen who is willing to sell their land to them, and, therefore giving them a chance to become landowners. And the difficulty with these alien bootleggers is that they are always able to find some American citizen who will buy the stuff. Talk about the distinguished counsel of the Anti-Saloon League of America. Why, he is the fellow that made bootlegging popular. He is not considered an enemy by the bootlegger, either native born or alien. He is the man who made it possible for them to ply their trade, and it may be that out on the Pacific coast, rather than build additional accommodations to their jails so that they can take care of these violators of the law, both alien and citizen, they prefer to have Uncle Sam bear the expense and ship them out of the country. I have no objection to providing that by law, but I think we are entering upon a rather dubious experiment if we permit the States by legislation to say what aliens shall remain in the United States. In some of these very erratic and irrational States we may find that they will pass some very unreasonable law, with very heavy punishment, and they can come in then with their application and require that the alien shall be deported.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. I would like to state to the gentleman that I represent one congressional district on the Pacific coast, and I have not heard from anybody in California favoring the passage of this act. I would also suggest that every time the people in the State of California have been called on to pass on a State-wide enforcement act they have voted overwhelmingly against it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has not the gentleman read the reports of the grand juries of his own State?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman, I think, is in that unhappy class that is not permitted to bask in the sunshine of the smiles of the Anti-Saloon League. How the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] got on that list I do not know. The gentleman naturally would not hear of this urgent and overwhelming demand, because the band from the Pacific coast in the gentleman's own State is led by the distinguished gentleman sitting at the table on the other side of the aisle, who recognizes, without employing the radio mechanism, the martial strains, and he can picture in his mind the banner flowing to the breeze as the Anti-Saloon League army marches along its course, attempting to keep up with the law which it has fathered and attempting to catch up with punishment for its enforcement.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we made the law a little too drastic at the start. We should have followed the course embarked upon in the great State of Kansas, or in Minnesota, or in Iowa, or in Nebraska, and if we had we would find that the prohibition legislation there was a matter of growth and development. They did not fall upon their unsuspecting citizens at one swoop with prohibition legislation. They found that they had to formulate the law and improve it from time to time as public sentiment supported and indorsed it.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TINCHER. Speaking of different State laws, I am wondering if the law of Massachusetts punishing witches by death is being successfully enforced.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would state to the gentleman that Massachusetts never had any such law as that since the Constitution of the United States was adopted, and a great deal of the punishment of witches by death in Massachusetts is pure fiction and was used only years ago to frighten naughty little boys and little girls in Kansas and other Western States who would not behave and would not go to sleep at night. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I am very glad, indeed, to learn from the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] that nobody has contributed to his campaign and that he, as he merits, has received the indorsement of his district. I trust he will continue to do so for years to come. However, there are campaigns in Michigan where the successful candidate can not make that claim. [Laughter.] I mention no names.

Mr. Chairman, I would like now to ask the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], who has charge of this measure, if he believes this bill in its present form is entirely free from complications in respect to putting into the power of a Cabinet officer authority, after hearing, to deport an alien for a violation of some State law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit me, I shall be very glad to answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two minutes. Answering the question, I would state that in all the time that the United States has received immigration it has never had sufficient deportations to protect the United States. In 10 years' time the total deportations of the United States for all causes have been only a few over 30,000. We go about and gather people up after they are convicted and sentenced for certain abhorrent crimes, such as the violation of the Mann Act, we take them out of the poorhouses as public charges and send them back to the country whence they came, and yet we have been sitting here quietly for several years permitting them notoriously to violate our narcotic act by the peddling of dangerous drugs and to seduce and ruin our people, and now that we have a prohibition act we should try to have it enforced and should punish aliens who will not live up to it, even to the point of deportation if repeated violation makes such aliens undesirable as residents.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think there is any complication likely to arise——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not the slightest. If a man commits murder under a State law and serves his sentence, if they proceed against him under a warrant of this kind, they can and should deport him.

Mr. WALSH. How were they going to deport him if he should be hanged the day before? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, they do not always hang men for murder.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from Massachusetts disputed the historical authenticity of the story of the burning of the witch at Salem, he failed to take cognizance of the fact that the witch-burning spirit actuates the proponents of this legislation. This bill provides for the deportation of noncitizens for a violation of the prohibition law or of the prohibition regulation of any State. The penalty of deportation is to be added to the present penalties. I wish I could find language adequate to express what I think of the proponents of the bill. Unfortunately the parliamentary situation does not permit it. Parliamentary practice would not permit a Member to say to other Members that they are hypocrites, fanatics, or stupid. Deportation is one of the most cruel forms of punishment. It was practiced by the Bourbons of France, and I am not surprised that the Bourbons of Texas support it. If a man violates a law, punish him. If he happens to have had enough intellect to choose to be born in the United States, if at the moment of his birth he possessed enough genius to choose this flag, then if he violates a law of his own land he should be punished the more severely.

He flouts the law of his own choosing; the law of his own making. He violates a Constitution purchased by the blood of his forefathers, and he is so much more of a criminal, if distinctions are to be drawn between citizens and noncitizens in the enforcement of the law. Some countries of Europe have been so reorganized that a man can not be deported to the country of his origin. New governments and new allegiances have been forced upon many of the peoples of Europe as the result of the last war. We are continuing the hysterical war legislation. The principle of deportation was brought in during the war to deal with an extraordinary and unprecedented emergency. Now you are going to deport a man because he has taken a drink in violation of the law. Some of you would be deported if you happened to be foreign born and noncitizens. [Applause.] The noncitizen is to be a legal outcast. Let us be honest about it. Why, gentlemen, this proposition merely indicates that the mentality of Congress has become exhausted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. We have been in session nearly a year. The legislative projects that you were assembled for have been finished, and you have nothing to do. But there are some committees that, out of their fatigued brains, bring forth all sorts of inane, incoherent, monstrous, impossible things for us to contend with. I wish Congress would adjourn. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I can not remain silent while you are perpetrating this piece of iniquity. History repeats itself. They used to boil men in oil when they did not agree with particular opinions. We are going that way now. Here you propose to make something immoral that is conceded to be moral.

Mr. VAILE. Conceded by whom?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Evidently by the law previous to this. It is conceded by your report that there was no moral turpitude in violating the prohibition law. There are thousands, yes millions, of our people who do not think there is any moral turpitude in violating the prohibition law.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I can not; I have only four minutes.

In my district there are Italians, a splendid people, who have been accustomed to their wine. Do they think that there is any moral turpitude in manufacturing wine for consumption in their own homes? Do the German people, who constitute the great basic people of my constituency, think there is any moral turpitude in the manufacturing of beer and wine in their own homes? Do the Polish people, who constitute another basic element of my constituency, think there is any moral turpitude in the consumption of beer and wine? No; they do not and they will not. They are most vehement in their resentment against the curtailment of what they consider their moral right. Now, you propose to take many hundreds, perhaps, of my people, who do not think that they have been guilty of any moral turpitude, because of some slight violation of the prohibition law, and cut them off from their families. They perhaps have been here many years; their children have grown up in the United States; their sons probably fought in the World War to make the world "safe for democracy." The mother and the father with their children are enjoying their lives in America. Perhaps the old people have not taken out their citizenship papers; I do not deem them guilty of any serious crime for not doing that in many, many cases. I am in favor of every man who comes to our country taking out citizenship papers and becoming a citizen, but there are, as I say, many hundreds who have not, and I do not consider that they have been guilty of any great or heinous crime. You propose to take these people, break up their families, and send them out into the world to God knows where; let their fate rest upon the arbitrary decisions of one man in the United States, whom you create a czar to determine the life and the liberty of the individuals covered by this infamous bill. We are becoming more and more to be a despotic, autocratic, czaristic country, placing might and power in individuals to determine the future, the life, the liberty of our citizens, and it is time that we should stop and not go any further with this specious, this futile, this czaristic legislation that you are seeking to place upon the statute books.

The prohibition amendment has been adopted; the Volstead Act has been passed. It should be enforced; but to enact this statute is going beyond the bounds of common sense. It is another step in the direction of creating disrespect for all law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time, six minutes, I believe, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS]. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is difficult to remain silent, even if one has not any original thought to contribute to the discussion, when such a bill is presented to this body and when one has reason to fear that the measure will pass. I suppose one of the greatest faults in American public life to-day is hypocrisy, and of all the measures that are open to that charge this measure is one of the worst.

The gentleman from California this morning stated that the manufacturer and seller of drugs and the violators of the Harrison Act are in the same class with the violators of the Volstead Act. I wanted to ask him then, but he could not yield, and I desire to ask him now, whether he considers that great farming class of the State of California that is to-day devoting itself to the tremendous industry of grape growing, is in the same class with the manufacturer of heroin intended to be sold to minors in the streets and slums of New York City? He is putting them in the same class. And you gentlemen, in this legislation, are putting them in the same class. Read the history of the grape industry of California since prohibition went into effect and you will know what is happening. They are growing grapes and shipping them by the carload directly to foreigners to be manufactured into home-made wines. It is one of the bases of the prosperity of that State. Now, you gentlemen are going to say to the unfortunate foreigner who buys the grape and manufactures it into home-made wine for his own consumption that he is a criminal, to be torn from his fireside here in the United States and from his family, never to come back to this, his new home, while the grower of the grape, intended for the consumption of that foreigner, is to be considered among the foremost prosperous and respected American citizens. [Applause.] In the name of truth, in the name of honor, in the name of common sense, was there ever a more outrageous proposition put before a legislative body? To grow grapes and sell them to the foreigner to manufacture wine out of is a legitimate business, but we must deport the foreigner as a criminal. [Applause.]

In this country our citizenship is made up of all races and of all nationalities. They come here because they believe they are going to get fair play, a new freedom, and as they find that our laws are just and there is no discrimination shown they stay, and after one or two generations they become indistinguishable from the native-born American. What is going to be the effect of this class of legislation on these new arrivals? You are foisting an unjust measure on them. By this legislation you are telling them that it is all right for the Americans to grow the stuff to sell to them, but that he who buys it from those who grow it is a criminal if he uses it. If you are honest with yourselves you can not vote for such a proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What is the alien now if he uses this manufactured liquor?

Mr. MILLS. What is he if he makes homemade wine?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is he a violator of the law?

Mr. MILLS. I do not know whether he is a violator of the Volstead Act or not, but he may be a violator of some State law.

Now you gentlemen, of course, are going to pass this measure. It may or may not become a law. But even if I believed in this extreme legislation I should vote "no" on this proposition, because you are going so far in your frantic efforts to overcome your initial mistake that you are going to break down our whole system of law enforcement. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, it is rather a new idea to me to find Members of the House of Representatives of the United States impliedly, at least, charged with hypocrisy on account of the offense of endeavoring to support a statute of the United States passed in obedience to a plain constitutional mandate, and passed by an overwhelming majority of the Congress. It seems to me it ill becomes gentlemen of the House to bandy about such words as "hypocrisy" in that connection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. VAILE. For half a minute.

Mr. FESS. Did we not have the same charge of hypocrisy leveled against the legislation that we are now trying to enforce?

Mr. VAILE. Yes; and I suppose it will be done in the future by anybody who does not like such legislation.

Mr. FESS. And by the same people?

Mr. VAILE. Yes; by the same people.

Let us look at this question from the immigration standpoint. We can admit to the United States whom we please; we can refuse to admit whom we please; we can deport out whom we please. The question of the admission of aliens to the United States or their residence in the United States is one which is addressed only to our own good judgment. If we wanted to be so unreasonable, we could provide that no one should come to the United States who had red hair. It is entirely up to us. We could provide that if aliens come into the United States they can not stay unless they comply with our rules, and as a matter of fact we do require such aliens to go back unless they comply with certain of our rules. One of our rules is that they shall not be mentally deficient. Another is that they must not belong to societies opposed to our Government. Here to-day we are proposing a rule which is that if they do not comply with certain statutes of the United States, passed, as I say, by an overwhelming majority of the Congress, they may then be sent back, if, after their conviction and after they have had another day in court before the Secretary of Labor, they shall be deemed by him to be undesirable residents. But lo and behold, when it comes to the matter of enforcing that kind of a rule we find that the sentiment of the House is pervaded with another idea. The enforcement of a particular law is obnoxious to some gentlemen and so they would have us understand that there is some new principle involved in sending an alien away because he will not comply with it. You may send him back because he is a mental degenerate, or you may send him back because he is a moral degenerate. You may send him back because he is likely to become a public charge; that is to say, because he is poor and incompetent. You may send him back for this or for that, but for Heaven's sake do not send him back because he violates the narcotic act or the prohibition act!

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Why not for the violation of any statute?

Mr. VAILE. That might be well enough, but we can not do everything at once.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will you vote for that?

Mr. VAILE. I want to see this statute passed. I do not want it encumbered by other things.

Now, it is said that an American-born violator of the law is as culpable as the alien violator. I think he is even more culpable. But the American violator is here; he is our citizen. We have got to deal with him in some other way. We can say to the alien violator, "You can not stay unless you comply with our rule." Is it a great hardship?

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] gets up here and in an eloquent address says he is not willing to take the chance of putting this arbitrary power in the hands of the Secretary of Labor, the chance that the Secretary of Labor may hold as undesirable somebody who has been convicted and had his day in court and who will have another day in court; he is not willing to take the chance of the Secretary of Labor holding such a man undesirable. While he was speaking I counted in that gallery yonder 18 boys all less than 14 years of age, a group of bright youngsters from some school, eagerly listening to this debate to learn how their country's laws are made. They have since gone out of the gallery. I am not going to take the chance for those boys. I am more concerned about them than I am for the alien violator of our laws, who would wreck their young lives for a few filthy dollars.

My district comprises less than 8 per cent of aliens. I am informed by the district attorney that during his term of office—that is, since the beginning of the year 1921—70 per cent of convictions for the violation of the narcotic and liquor laws have been of aliens. Talk about taking a chance! There is chance enough to take from our own citizens who have no respect for their obligations to this country. I am not making light of that dreadful chance. It is full of perils, indeed; but must we take the additional chance which we are asked to take simply because of your extreme tenderness to aliens? We did not make these people. We did not compel them to come here. We do not have to have them, and if they do not comply with our laws we are not going to have them. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] gives you a most pathetic picture of some man who has lived here for 50 years being deported to a country whose very language has grown strange to him, deported because he commits some trifling violation of law. In the first place, it is perfectly nonsensical to suppose that anyone is going to be deported for a trivial or a merely technical violation. This bill is intended to reach the criminal profiteer in vice and poison, and it will be so applied. But let us examine the gentleman's argument a little.

He says that the minute a man lands in this country the flag covers him and the Constitution protects him. Well, if he is so interested in the protection of the flag and of the Constitution, how does it happen that he has remained an alien for 50 years? [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Many of these people have believed for years that the filing of their first papers made them citizens of the United States, and some of them have gone on for 50 years under that belief.

Mr. VAILE. That has happened in two or three States where they could vote on their first papers.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It has happened in a multitude of States.

Mr. VAILE. The gentleman is mistaken. The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has recently investigated that subject and found only three such States. But, at all events, there is no reason for their thinking that now. That subject has been thoroughly threshed out in our committee, and it has been thoroughly threshed out in the newspapers. But, in any case, does not that man owe any obligation to the flag which is supposed to protect him? Is the Constitution to be a dead letter as to him? Why, gentlemen, let us look at it from a reasonable standpoint. It is a question of our rules. Can we enforce our own rules, and can we enforce them by saying simply that people who will not abide by them can not live here? They can live in the countries from which they originally came. It ought not to be such a terrible hardship for them to go back to the country which gave them birth. I have very little sympathy with the cry that we hear that people who can not get along in this country, who can not conform to its laws, must nevertheless stay here because they will get along still worse in the country from which they came?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VAILE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Even if we wanted to deport our own criminals, we could not do so, but we can deport aliens.

Mr. VAILE. Our own criminals are a separate problem. We have got to take care of them as best we can. They may fill our jails. It is unfortunate, perhaps, that we have not some place where we can send them; but, gentlemen, it is of no use to stand here and urge that the American is more culpable than the alien. Perhaps he is; for my part I believe that he usually is; but if so, he is our problem and the alien is some other country's problem, because the word "alien" means that he belongs to some other country and does not belong to us. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to deport certain undesirable aliens and to deny readmission to those deported," approved May 10, 1920, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(4) All aliens who may after this subdivision takes effect be convicted of any violation or conspiracy to violate any of the following acts, the judgment on such conviction having become final, but no such alien shall be deported until the termination of his imprisonment, if any, upon such conviction:

"(a) The national prohibition act of October 28, 1919;

"(b) The act entitled 'An act to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes,' approved December 17, 1914, as amended;

"(c) Any other statute of the United States, or of a State or Territory, prohibiting or regulating the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, or of opium, coca leaves, or any salt, derivative, or preparation of opium or coca leaves."

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am willing that the vote should be taken without debate.

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 30, noes 99.

Accordingly the motion was rejected.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We have heard something here to-day about Salem witch burning by those who oppose this measure. I never engaged in any fight when a question of law and order was involved in which I did not hear from men who object to law enforcement something about the question of witch burning. I recognize that the remark made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] was a playful one, as he is supporting this measure. If I were able to do it, I should like to take the old New Englander with his fanaticism, if he had it, and his faults—and he had them—but with his upstanding, towering Americanism notwithstanding all, and set him over against the bunch—not here, but elsewhere—from which these words have come, whose record for crime and lawlessness is bad. I will take the noble old New Englander in preference. [Applause.]

Something has been said by way of comparison of the great Frenchman, Lafayette, with the liquor forces in America. That was an unfortunate and unhappy comparison. The great honor which we pay to the memory of Lafayette entitles him to more respectful treatment than that. He belongs in a nobler company. His name should never be presented in connection with such a cause. He joined with our forefathers in the establishment of a free America when they were led by Washington, whose name was presented by the gentleman from Maryland in the same connection. The lawlessness connected with the whisky business presented itself to the great Washington. The first great uprising against the law and authority of the United States after its Government was established was from the same lawless source; and while Washington was a liberal-minded man, he was above all a great, upstanding, Nordic American, knowing that law must be upheld, regardless of whether the citizen approved or disapproved it. He knew, declared, and acted upon the proposition that the orderly and regular enforcement of the law is necessary to the safety of the citizenship of the United States and to the continuance of a free Government. In his first administration he quelled the whisky insurrection. We are trying to hold down the same lawless business and reduce the evil of dope peddling. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out paragraph (c), on page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 2, beginning with line 10, strike out paragraph (c).

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I stated in my opening remarks, this bill is an amendment to a dead-letter law. Every paragraph to which this is amendatory refers to acts passed under the war powers of Congress.

I repeat, as you will find at the bottom of page 1 of the report, that this act makes it mandatory, upon the conviction of any person who has violated a State law, that he shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody, and then a hearing may be had. And the Secretary of Labor, after hearing, if he decides the alien is undesirable, may order that he be deported.

Further, this act you are seeking to amend by section 2 gives no power to the court over the decision of the Secretary of Labor in passing upon the question whether this alien is a desirable citizen or not. For section 2 of the act we are amending provides:

That in every case in which any such alien is ordered expelled or excluded from the United States under the provisions of this act the decision of the Secretary of Labor shall be final.

There have been many instances in the administration of this law under section 19 where the Secretary of Labor has gone beyond his constitutional authority in imprisoning without notice a large number of aliens on the ground that they were not in sympathy with our Government; but the Supreme Court, the palladium of the rights and liberties of the American citizens, have upheld the right of even the alien to be granted a hearing. I repeat that I am unwilling to vest in the Secretary of Labor the authority to deport an alien who has been sought after by some State prohibition enforcement officer fanatic and has been fined to grant to the Secretary of Labor the privilege of deporting that alien. As has been said many times in debate, the sponsors of this bill recognize the futility of national prohibition enforcement in communities where the sentiment is opposed to it, and now are trying to pass a legislative monstrosity by granting to the Secretary of Labor powers that were not even granted in war times to Cabinet officials or the President. That is your much-vaunted liberty and freedom under the American institution. On the one side you have an American citizen violating the law and paying a nominal fine, and beside him you may have an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen subjected to a similar fine, and as soon as the fine has been levied and paid the Secretary of Labor takes him into custody with the power to deport him from these shores to some land where he has no home. [Applause.]

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened with considerable interest to the debate on this bill, and I think I came here with my mind open and free, not having prejudged the case, I am sure. But I am now prepared to say that I can not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin that this bill deprives any individual, whether he be native or alien, in any unreasonable way of any right he has here under the flag of this country. I think, on the contrary, that this is a reasonable provision. I think it is one that should be adopted by this Congress and one that should be enforced after it is adopted.

Why, there is nothing in the argument that any man is deprived of his rights or of his liberty in an arbitrary manner, but, on the contrary, he must have been convicted of a violation of the statutes of the United States, and then only can the Secretary of Labor take action.

I shall support this bill, but I want to take this opportunity to call your attention to an existing law which is high-handed and in violation of the letter and spirit of that Constitution about which we have heard so much this afternoon. I believe that in the enactment of legislation for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment it should at all times be reasonable in its character. But you have in connection with laws adopted in pursuance of the eighteenth amendment a statute now that takes the property of an American citizen, not of an alien, and confiscates that property without due process of law, and it is being indulged in in every State in this Union to-day.

Suppose that here in the District of Columbia a prohibition agent or one connected with the Revenue Department of this Government should go into a building owned by one of you gentlemen and should there find intoxicating liquors, or, perchance, find where an illicit still had at some time in the past been located. He arrests you, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue immediately makes an assessment of a tax, together with a $1,000 penalty, provided under the Volstead Act. You can go into court and be abundantly able to show your innocence before the court and a jury of your peers, but notwithstanding that fact this assessment is enforced by notice after notice, and then a distress warrant is issued and levy is made upon your property, notwithstanding the jury has passed upon your innocence and given you a verdict of not guilty.

Now, I say to you that I have been a consistent supporter of prohibition. In my State 15 years ago the first political campaign in which I ever engaged was to make Tennessee, my native State, a prohibition State. I am in favor of prohibition now, but I am not in favor of any law that will take my property or your property or the property of any citizen of America without due process of law and giving him his day in court. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to get a little information, if I can. Under the act of 1920 can the Secretary of Labor arrest a man before or after hearing?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The act of 1920 applies to persons convicted.

Mr. MANN. Of course the act provides—

Shall upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor be taken into his custody and deported in the manner provided * * * if the Secretary of Labor, after hearing, finds that such aliens are undesirable residents of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. If it were a matter of original construction left to me, I should say that he could not issue the warrant until after the hearings. What I want to know is the fact. What does he do?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He does issue a warrant, I think.

Mr. CABLE. The procedure requires two warrants. When information is lodged with the Secretary of Labor a warrant is issued and the man is taken into custody, and then if after the hearing is completed the Secretary of Labor finds that he is an undesirable citizen he is deported.

Mr. MANN. And that is the construction that the Department of Labor gives to this?

Mr. CABLE. Under the regulations.

Mr. MANN. So that under this bill any man who has been fined under the prohibition law for violation of either the national or a State law can at once be arrested?

Mr. CABLE. Yes; when information is lodged and the warrant is issued.

Mr. MANN. There is no requirement of information being lodged by the statute. On information being lodged he can issue the warrant any time he pleases?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. On his own suggestion?

Mr. STAFFORD. The hearings disclose that that is the practice of the Department of Labor.

Mr. CABLE. That is the regulation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 41, noes 91.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am a prohibitionist. I participated in the prohibition contest in my own State when to do so there was sometimes almost involved the sacrifice of long-standing friendships. I have consistently supported the prohibition legislation that has been enacted here. I may say further that I am in full accord with the desire to restrain the activities of unworthy aliens. So strong is my view on that point that I deeply regret that the Committee on Immigration, instead of confining its work to legislation that is not very material, does not present for our consideration a bill looking to a permanent law upon the subject of immigration which would absolutely exclude all undesirable foreigners. For some unaccountable reason there has been a failure to bring in such a bill, although the promise was made a long time ago that an opportunity would be speedily given us to vote on such a measure. Why that promise has not been kept can only be conjectured. But it has not been kept, and thus we are now engaged in determining what we will do with offending aliens already admitted, when, in my humble judgment, we ought to be dealing with the far more important subject.

We are now on section (c) of this bill. Is it reasonable? One of its provisions in substance is that an alien may be deported if he violates the liquor laws of any one of the 48 States of the Union. Putting out of view the Federal law, we know that the State laws are almost as diverse as the conditions and characteristics of the 48 States. I was told a moment ago by a Representative that in his State the manufacture and the use of liquor for sacramental purposes is not permitted, and that it is not permitted for medicinal purposes. Accordingly, we are asked to say that an alien who violates the law of that particular State to the extent of making or importing or using liquor for sacramental or medicinal purposes shall be liable to deportation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Not now.

Mr. BLANTON. That law——

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Please wait one moment. Is that reasonable? I ask as a prohibitionist if that is a reasonable proposition? I ask if such legislation will not put us in the attitude before the country of doing something unreasonable, and which may properly be charged as extreme and fanatical? One danger to the prohibition cause to-day is that by such legislation those who are deeply and heartily anxious that the cause shall prove a success may contribute to its final defeat. I do not discover—and this is rather significant—that the leader of the prohibition forces upon this floor, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], the man entitled to more credit than anyone here for what has been done along prohibition lines, assumes any responsibility for this bill. To-day I have not heard his voice raised in favor of it. Mr. Wheeler has been criticized on the floor. I for one respect Mr. Wheeler and the great organization to which he belongs, and, so far as I know, there is an absence of evidence that Mr. Wheeler or that organization favors this provision. Regarding this provision as I do, I must oppose it. I must vote my convictions on this matter, as I shall hope always to vote my convictions on every measure. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia. Several gentlemen are urging haste with respect to more restrictive immigration legislation. A great many people seem to think that you can take a pair of scissors and a paste pot and write an immigration act overnight—a strong, workable act. And yet when one comes on this floor with a deportation bill of this kind, designed to put some teeth into the immigration act, you find the very gentlemen who want more restrictive legislation are afraid of the teeth. Do you know what we are doing with our present deportation provisions? Deportation is a severe act, the last step, and one of the very hardest steps to accomplish. You do not pick a man up and send him out of the country just with a kick. It is a long process, as a rule. If the alien to be deported has been here some years the expense of sending him overseas is borne by the Government, and he is sent to his own country only with the consent of that country. That country usually consents because it wants to send other immigrants here. Let me refer you to these figures in respect to deportation for the last eight months' period, and we have had more deportations in the past year than for some time. For insanity, epilepsy, mental defective, and so forth, we deported 330. Those are the people that are found usually in insane asylums. The State asylums report to the Immigration Service and ask our Federal authorities to send them out of the country. Those deported because they were physically defective were 47 in eight months; because of loathsome or dangerous contagious diseases, 55; because they were likely to become, or had become, public charges, 1,190. Those are the poor broken wretches who failed in life's battle after coming here from some other country. They have collapsed and they are in the poorhouses, and we grab them up and shove them out. They have violated no law; they have simply broken down in the fight for existence. Who would leave the alien narcotic law violators in while he sends out the pauper? Of criminals we have deported 270 in eight months, and that number is above the average. As I said in the beginning, at any time the Secretary of Labor or any of his agents takes a man who is convicted under a State law and deports him as an undesirable citizen because he has violated a State law in regard to liquor or drugs, you may rest assured he is an undesirable alien, not fit to stay in the United States, and properly one to be deported.

Mr. CHALMERS and Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] is recognized.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

This seems to have developed into a contest between the "wets" and "drys." Now, in one sense of the word I suppose that I may be classified as a "wet"; that is, I am in favor of water transportation. And, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in 8-point type an address I delivered last Saturday before the City Club of Baltimore on the subject of transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Earlier in the proceedings I objected to extending the remarks of the gentleman from California, and therefore at present I shall be obliged to object to the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 2, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "or of a State or Territory."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 2, lines 10 and 11, after the word "States" in line 10, strike out the words: "or of a State or Territory."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to state that this amendment is along the line suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] and along the lines which I suggested earlier in the day, to the effect that I believe we are entering upon a field that is likely to give rise to complications if we permit a Cabinet officer, situated in Washington, to pass upon the question of deporting people because they may have violated some State law.

Now, we have an all-comprehensive national statute, and it is as drastic as most of the State laws now in force, with possibly one or two exceptions. It seems to me that if this deportation provision in reference to the prohibition act be included in the law, we might well confine it to violations of the Federal statutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I want to call the committee's attention to the fact that under the present law a man who is convicted of a crime for which he is punished for more than a year, and which involves moral turpitude, is deportable. There are 48 States of the Union now dealing with all those classes of cases, and any man convicted in any State of the Union to-day of a crime involving moral turpitude, where the judgment of the court is for more than a year, he is deported, namely, for crimes relating to theft, arson, burglary, and all other crimes of that character involving moral turpitude. And under the law to-day, after the man has been convicted and served a term of sentence as provided, it is the duty of the Secretary of Labor to make a complaint, or for some one to make a complaint, and then the party is arrested. Then it is the ordinary course of procedure to require a hearing before, first, the inspector, the immigration commissioner, and then it goes to the commissioner on immigration through his counsel; then goes to the Department of Labor through his counsel, and then finally comes to the Secretary of Labor after it has passed through all these proceedings, after due notice has been given, and when the Secretary finds the man is of an undesirable character and has been convicted under any of the laws of the 48 States he can then be deported.

These statutes to-day in regard to violating the narcotic laws are, most of them, State laws. Most of them do not involve moral turpitude, because opium for many years has been dealt in not only by England but by this country, and to-day we permit opium to be sold, and therefore it must be specifically provided that a man be deported after having been convicted by a State law. And there is no statute on the statute books now that reaches thousands of cases of those who are violating the narcotic laws and to prevent the ruining of the young men and women of this country, and where the testimony shows that 98 per cent of the violators are aliens. Then why do you want to be squeamish in regard to the deporting of these men who are destroying the very existence of the communities in which they live?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts by striking out the words "or Territory."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Amend the amendment offered by Mr. WALSH, by striking out the words "or Territory."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is the only parliamentary way by which I can get to speak on the question raised by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], who is a distinguished lawyer. He gave as his reason for objecting to subdivision 3 of the bill that various of the States had passed inconsistent laws. He said, forsooth, that some State had passed a law prohibiting this, and another State prohibiting that, and because such States had passed inconsistent laws he was in favor of striking out the third provision and limiting the bill to a Federal law. The distinguished gentleman from Virginia is too good a lawyer not to know that if any State should pass a law in any way inconsistent with the provisions of the eighteenth amendment it would be unconstitutional, because it would not be in conformity with the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution. The eighteenth amendment permits the States to pass regulatory measures with respect to prohibition only when those regulatory measures are consistent with the provisions of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think the States had authority to pass such a law before the eighteenth amendment was a part of the Constitution?

Mr. BLANTON. But the eighteenth amendment specifically provides that the States are given the same concurrent right to pass laws to uphold the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which is to prohibit the sale and manufacture or gift of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. MANN. But the eighteenth amendment did not take away from the States any power which they had before the eighteenth amendment became a part of the Constitution.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of this bill exactly as it is written, without the additional crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

Mr. MANN. Then why did you move to strike out a part of it?

Mr. BLANTON. Merely as a pro forma motion in order to answer the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE]. Under the parliamentary situation I had no other means, and I had to use a subterfuge in order to gain the floor.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise to move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose it will be of very little consequence what one may say on this measure, because the Members of the House seem to have practically made up their minds as to how they are going to vote, and they will not be influenced by reason in the matter of their voting. But I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that there never was a more undesirable piece of legislation than this bill which is now presented for their consideration. [Applause.]

Looking at it from a lawyer's viewpoint alone and without regard to the so-called division of "wets" and "drys," this is a bill which is intended to refer to the question of immigration and the regulation of immigration through restrictions more than anything else. The bill should be considered without regard to the question of enforcing prohibition. If you were dealing with this matter and were framing a scientific piece of legislation and would deport any alien who violated any national law, that might be received with some consideration. But when you are striving to select two classes of offenses, mere misdemeanors, and say that for them the punishment shall be deportation, you are making a distinction that is not justified in logic or in common sense. [Applause.]

The criticism of this bill made by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] is well founded. Any regulatory enactment of a State may become the subject of deportation. Is that just, equitable, or proper punishment? Think of it! A man may come here and do that which results in a fine, not imprisonment—he may commit an act which is malum prohibitum, not one which is malum in se; and for that, on a stranger in our midst, you are going to impose a penalty which is one of the severest penalties, in my judgment, that could be imposed. Does the punishment fit the crime? You are going to deport him for having violated perhaps a merely regulatory provision in some State law.

What right has this national body to impose penalties which are to be enforced for the violation of State laws? Let us confine ourselves to imposing penalties for the violation of Federal laws, laws made by this Congress. Let us enforce them if we see fit, even by deportation of aliens. But why say that everyone who violates some regulatory provision of some State law shall be liable to deportation if unfortunately he is an alien living in our midst?

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Do I understand that the Secretary of Labor could deport a citizen of Delaware against the will of the courts and the people of Delaware?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If he is an alien resident, not a citizen resident in Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. If he is not convicted by the people of Delaware?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The man would have to be convicted of some violation of law, but it might be some very minor violation of law.

Mr. LAYTON. In other words, if he was deported, it would not be a Federal act in violation of the will of the State?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No.

But the chief objection that I have against the enactment of such legislation as this is the looseness of its terms. Read it:

All aliens who may after this subdivision takes effect be convicted of any violation or conspiracy to violate any of the following acts—

And, then, in paragraph (c), wherein it says:

Any other statute of the United States or of a State or Territory prohibiting or regulating the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes—

And so forth.

Think of the monstrous nature and character of a punishment like that for some trivial violation of the law which a man has perhaps inadvertently committed, but of which nevertheless he is guilty! For remember, my friends, that in those things——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, can we arrange for more time?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for one minute more.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I ask for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I was going to remark that in these cases which become crimes merely because they are prohibited there is not necessarily any moral turpitude, except you may say that a man who violates any law is guilty of moral turpitude; but as between those things which men in conscience consider right and those things which they say are wrong there is a clear distinction in the law. And when you include in this section as crimes things which are merely made crimes by statute, which are not morally wrong, which are called bad only because prohibited, and for which men are liable to conviction because they are prohibited, in which even the intent of wrongdoing may be wanting, yet because they are prohibited the person may be convicted, I respectfully submit that when you so provide, singling out such cases and imposing the grave penalty of deportation, you are enacting a monstrous piece of legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. WHEELER. To demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is not any regular order.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I believe that the amendment should be defeated.

According to my understanding, in the adoption of the eighteenth amendment concurrent jurisdiction was conferred on the several States of the Union to enact such rules and regulations as they might enact or prescribe to assist the National Government in enforcing the eighteenth amendment. I can conceive that perhaps there might be violations of those State laws and regulations, and there would be cases in which persons should be punished for violations of State laws where perhaps there would be no direct violation of any Federal statute whatsoever.

But be that as it may, gentlemen, there have been some of the most surprising arguments made here on the floor of this House that I have ever listened to. I am not yet willing to concede that any violator of the laws of this country is bigger than the Constitution and laws of this Government.

It has been stated here that this bill should not be passed because it might be considered too drastic or fanatical. I want to answer that by saying that in our attempt to support the Constitution of the United States and enforce it, we are not going to write a law that is too drastic for that purpose.

That is exactly the trouble now, that the laws by which the eighteenth amendment is to be enforced are not sufficiently drastic. I am willing to write into this law the provisions of this bill, which to my mind are simply these, that the fundamental principle of this bill is that if an alien violates the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, he shall be deported from the United States upon conviction for such crime, and I believe that should be the law. That is what this bill undertakes to do, and its enactment will assist us in upholding the law and preventing its being violated as is now being done. Of what particular benefit is an alien citizen who comes to our country and claims the protection of our flag, who having come here undertakes to tear down the Constitution of our country? [Applause.] Let us send him back where he belongs.

That is what this bill will do, and I am in favor of passing it without making a single change, and I particularly oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of five minutes debate on this amendment and all amendments to the bill be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment and all amendments to the bill be closed at the end of five minutes.

Mr. LONDON. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then I move, Mr. Chairman, that at the end of five minutes all debate on this amendment and all amendments to the bill be closed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] desires five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves that at the end of 10 minutes all debate on this amendment and all amendments to the bill be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the other day I was reading a story placed in the time when in England a great many crimes were punishable by death. The result was that it was rather difficult in many cases to convict a person of a crime; and the experience of mankind, at least in those countries where the people have to do with government, is that excessive punishment adds to rather than detracts from the frequency of crime. Suppose you should put into a law a provision that a man should be hanged if he violated the Volstead Act. How often do you think you could convict anyone? I believe in upholding the law, but as a practical question if you provided that if a man took a drink of wine he should be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for 10 years you could not convict one in a thousand who were brought before the court for trial, and no man here—with the exception of a few—if he were on a jury with a plain case before him would vote to send a man to the penitentiary for life because he had taken a drink of wine or because he had given somebody else a drink of wine.

I apprehend this bill will pass this House, and I predict now that the result will be a more lax enforcement of the law than there is now, because if you bring before a jury an alien with whom the people of his locality are acquainted who has been convicted of taking a drink of wine or of giving a drink of wine to his neighbor and say that in addition to punishment by a fine of $10 he shall be taken away from his wife and children and sent to a foreign land you will not be able to convict him. [Applause.]

Mr. VAILE. Is there any United States statute now which prohibits a man from taking a drink of wine?

Mr. MANN. There is a statute of the United States and there are statutes of many States. I believe there is no statute which prevents a man from taking a drink of wine in his own home if he owned the wine before the eighteenth amendment was adopted, but there is a statute against it otherwise, not only Federal but State. It is a question of the enforcement of the law. Do you think you will be more apt to enforce a law—which I am sorry to say is now frequently violated—if you attempt to provide a more drastic punishment in a few cases, and probably encourage people in the end to violate the law, because the juries will not convict them? [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the force of the argument of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] and those who take his position, and I shall vote for the amendment before us. I believe the Federal law is broad enough——

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. BOX. Does the gentleman know that the bulk of the laws against the sale of narcotics are the laws enacted by the State, and that he will greatly weaken one of the fundamental provisions of this law when he eliminates that feature of it from this bill?

Mr. LOWREY. I shall not take the time to argue that with the gentleman, because I rose really to present another matter. I have only five minutes.

Two or three gentlemen have spoken of this bill as being monstrous, or a legislative monstrosity. I want to refer to another law that I think is more a monstrosity. I once had a good friend who was hanged. I suppose a good many of you gentlemen have had the same misfortune. Some of you may have had very good fortune to escape yourselves when your friends were hanged. [Laughter.] My friend was hanged for murder. The newspaper account said that when he committed the murder he had spent five hours in the saloon of the town. He was a man who came from one of the best families and had been a fine citizen, but a man whom liquor drove absolutely mad. He came out of that saloon and shot down a man in cold blood. For that he was hanged. The newspaper account said he had spent five hours in the saloon. Who put the saloon there and for what was it put there? The good State in which I lived was getting a thousand dollars a year of the profits of that saloon and was in copartnership with the business, and putting its fostering hand over the business and protecting it and backing it with law. The State and National Governments were both in league with it and helped to put the thing there. They put it there for one purpose and one alone, that men might go there and get drink. When this man went there and got liquor he became crazed by it. He was a man whose appetite had got where he could not control it, and it drove him into the saloon, and when he came out drunk he committed this murder. Then the same State that had passed that law, that had put that saloon there, that had backed it up, that had taken a part of its profits, turned around and hanged the man for committing the crime that he committed in the insanity gotten out of that saloon. I submit that you will never find a law more monstrous than that. When we talk about monstrosities, let us remember we are fighting a law that was the most infamous monstrosity this country ever had to deal with. I am willing to modify this reasonably, but I am in favor of the law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired; and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "or of a State or Territory."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were 73 ayes and 95 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11118) to provide for the deportation of certain undesirable aliens, and had directed him to report the same back without amendment with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts opposed to the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I am. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment striking out, in lines 10 and 11, page 2, the words "or of a State or Territory."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WALSH moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with an amendment striking out, on page 2, lines 10 and 11, the words "or of a State or Territory."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this particular amendment sought in the motion to recommit was submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts in the Committee of the Whole, and by an overwhelming vote the Committee of the Whole passed on this particular question and denied it, and it is now out of order under the rules of the House.

Mr. MANN. It is surprising that anybody who knows anything about the rules of the House would make such a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled. The question is on the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were 64 ayes and 112 noes.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for a division.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 222, nays 73, answered "present" 2, not voting 133, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I have already presented to the Speaker a copy of the New York World for last Sunday, which I submit raises the question of privilege, and upon that I ask recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that it raises the question of privilege. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to ask unanimous consent to address the House, if he desires to.

Mr. BLANTON. But I submit that under the rule any statement appearing in a newspaper which is a misrepresentation of facts, which would tend to bring into ridicule or disrepute the whole membership of the House, presents a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman cite some authority to that effect?

Mr. BLANTON. I call the Chair's attention to sections 2704 and 2705, volume 3, Hinds' Precedents.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is so much confusion on the floor of the House that it is impossible to hear. What is the matter now before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas rises to address the House on a question of privilege.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On what statement?

The SPEAKER. On a statement that was attributed to him in the New York World, and the question now proposed to the Chair is whether that particular article raises a question of privilege.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has that matter been submitted to the Speaker, or is it being presented now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is submitting it at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is being offered as a basis for rising to a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Chair has already stated that he does not think it presents a question of privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I refer the Chair to sections 2704 and 2705 of volume 3, Hinds' Precedents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that those are at all analogous to this matter. In each of those instances the Member was criticized in his representative capacity.

Mr. BLANTON. I will call the attention of the Chair to the specific matter, if the Chair will permit. The New York World attributes to me a statement to the effect that all Members of the House receive, for instance, a whisky flask and a poker set and various other articles as a matter of right from the stationery room, and there is also attributed to me the statement that every Member receives each Congress $2,100 of mileage. If that statement is left unchallenged before the country it may place the membership in an entirely false attitude. All the charges that I made in Austin, Tex., are contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 12, 1922, in the speech that I made from this floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the newspaper article to which the gentleman refers state that the gentleman made those remarks on the floor of the House or outside of the House?

Mr. BLANTON. Outside of the House. The article states that I say that every Member receives each Congress $2,100 of mileage, which is absurd, of course, as to Members from Virginia and Maryland. I did not make such statement either here or elsewhere, and I desire to correct it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am asking the question in order that I may have something in my own mind about whether it does present a question of privilege. If the gentleman is charged with having made it on the floor of the House, and is misrepresented in any statement that he made on the floor of the House, it might be different from what he might have been alleged to say in the State of Texas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cite the gentleman to a decision which he thinks covers the case, section 2708, volume 3, Hinds' Precedents:

No question of privilege arises from the fact that a newspaper has attributed to a Member certain remarks which he denies having used.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER. Where does the gentleman find any distinction between this and the matter to which he refers?

Mr. BLANTON. This distinction: If the attributed remarks are true that every Member here receives each Congress $2,100 in mileage——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman denies that they are true.

Mr. BLANTON. For instance, an average of $2,100 in mileage is received by the Texas Member for each Congress of three sessions, but is not received by every Member. Whisky flasks are received by some Members and poker sets are received by some Members, but not by all of them.

The SPEAKER. How are they received by any Member?

Mr. BLANTON. By a Member going over to the stationery room and having them charged against his stationery account.

The SPEAKER. He buys them.

Mr. BLANTON. He buys them against the stationery account. The remarks attributed to me would lead the country to believe that, as a matter of fact, every Member receives these.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will refer the gentleman to another decision, section 2691, volume 3, Hinds' Precedents, where a select committee was appointed to investigate certain charges against a Member. The Chair quotes from the finding of that committee:

But a libelous publication concerning a Member in his private character and capacity only has never been regarded as a breach of privilege, either of the body of which he is a Member or of the Member himself, and he must seek redress for such private injury in the same manner other citizens do, by vindication through the public press or by resort to the legal tribunals.

The Chair thinks it is entirely proper that the gentleman from Texas should deny having made the statement. The gentleman had opportunity the day before yesterday under general debate.

Mr. BLANTON. I then tried to get time.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair does not think it involves a question of privilege. The Chair will recognize the gentleman if he wishes to ask unanimous consent to proceed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9633. ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill and joint resolution:

H. R. 9979. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting a charter to the General Federation of Women's Clubs"; and

H. J. Res. 282. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to incur obligations for construction and maintenance of roads, bridges, and trails in Alaska, said obligations to be paid from the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

STATUE OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The Clerk called the Committee on the Library.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Library, I call up House Joint Resolution 127 to reerect the statue of Abraham Lincoln upon its original site.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up House Joint Resolution 127. This is on the Union Calendar. The House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 127, and the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. STAFFORD, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 127, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 127, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 127) to reerect the statue of Abraham Lincoln upon its original site.

Resolved, etc., That the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds of the War Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reerect the statue of Abraham Lincoln upon its original site in front of the courthouse, city of Washington, D. C., upon an appropriate foundation or pedestal in harmony with the statue.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there are several matters of historical data interesting to students of Lincoln, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, the first monument erected to the memory of Abraham Lincoln was unveiled in the city of Washington on the 15th day of April, 1868, exactly three years after he had given to his country, to use his own former words, the "full measure of devotion."

As its temporary mantle was withdrawn by the then President of the United States, Andrew Johnson, the mighty voice of the multitude gathered there rose in approval when the white marble figure of the martyr, crowning a heroic pedestal, stood lifelike before them. The same Lincoln whom those about knew and loved seemed to stand again familiarly before them, in the words of the orator of the day and Lincoln's personal friend, "a plain, unassuming but noble and Godlike specimen of human nature." "Here it stands," he cried, "in the plaza of the city, and here it will stand, we hope, to be seen by generations long hence to come."

Since then many years have passed along; many seasons have come and gone. More than 50 springs have lighted up the parks about it, and the winds of more than 50 autumns have whirled the withered leaves about its base; a thousand morning suns have tipped the pure whiteness of its crest; for half a century the barrages of the elements have swept its area; storm after storm have lashed in fury around its base, yet, typical of the life of its human counterpart, it has firmly stood throughout the years, the inspiration of the generations which have in reverence and adoration approached it.

Unveiled and dedicated on the 15th day of April, 1868, this graceful monument marked the plaza of the city until the 20th day of December, 1920, when it fell by virtue of iconoclastic propaganda directed against it, and the saintly figure was lowered, together with its pedestal and the stones supporting its plane of exaltation, where his friends, neighbors, and compatriots had placed it, and all together rolled away as backyard rubbish, suggesting to us once more that—

> Imperious Cæsar dead and turned to clay
> Might stop a hole to keep the wind away.
> Oh, that that earth, which kept the world in awe,
> Should patch a wall t' expel the winter's flaw.

After a lifetime the figure, when it made its descent from the pedestal and passed into the sacrilegious hands of those who profaned it, was in as perfect condition as on the day of its ascension. Strong as the immortality of the person whom it represented, the pure stone image, "corruptible, yet had put on incorruption; not mortal, yet had put on immortality," and had it not been for the mental mob spirit of mad burlesque artists could have remained where it was placed by loving hands for a thousand years.

This noble monument was the monument of the masses. It appealed to the common people, who loved it. More than any other statue of Lincoln, it was preeminently "of the people, by the people, and for the people." These people who had personally seen Lincoln about Washington during the war, many of them in frequent touch with him, accepted this statue as almost a living personification of their dead friend, and many were the silent tears that dropped from the eyes of the few remaining citizens of Washington who were alive at its erection when they saw its base and pedestal junked. The monument was paid for out of the meager purses of the citizens of Washington, who had long suffered the privations of the war, and from the soldiers and sailors passing through the city.

Of all the thousands who witnessed the dedication of this statue of Lincoln, a few tottering souls remain. The distinguished company, Generals Grant and Howard; the orator, B. B. French; the Congress; the members of the civic organizations; and all the vast concourse of people in and around upon the streets and crowded in the windows and upon the roofs, and with the thousands since born, are gone. On, down past their sympathetic Lincoln and "slowly through the churchyard gate" they have been borne. They sleep their last sleep. Only then the dire deed of the humiliation of Lincoln and the removal of his statue was accomplished. To-day the statue lies prone upon the earth, but the good which it has done can not be demolished, and the monument built in memory's sanctuary can not be dismantled.

All questions involved in the resolution under consideration revolve around two subjects: First, the figure; second, the place.

The monument was about 40 feet in height to the top of the statue. It rested on a solid foundation of blue rock, 6 feet in depth. The base was an octagon, 6 feet in height and about 7 feet from side to side, on which the base of the column rested; the lower part corresponded with the base and the upper part with the shaft, being circular and molded. The shaft was 18 feet in height, with an average of 3 feet—tapering—and surmounted by a molded cap 4 feet square and 2 feet thick, on which rested the base of the statue itself. While the monument was a most substantial and symmetrical object itself, yet now that the propaganda directed against it for a number of years by a coterie of pseudo artists has succeeded, it is not thought that the reerection of the old pedestal would be advisable, especially in view of the fact that the statue itself, from every angle considered, is worthy of a new support. It is of pure white marble. It is a little larger than life-size, being 7 feet in length, while Mr. Lincoln was close to 6 feet 4 in his stocking feet. Few men exceeded Mr. Lincoln in height, and this is strikingly demonstrated to anyone who will take the pains to examine the photograph, now hanging in the office of Mr. Elliott Woods, the architect of the Capitol, of the second inauguration of Lincoln on the front steps of the Capitol, in which he is seen towering above all those about him.

The statue represents Lincoln standing with his left hand resting on the emblem of the Union—the Roman facii—his head erect, with slight inclination forward, and his right hand partially open, as in the attitude he was wont to take in addressing an audience.

IT IS ARTISTIC.

The charge is made that this statue is inartistic—that is to say, it is guilty of not conforming to the principles of art.

To charge a statue of a dead personage with being inartistic is equivalent to imputing immorality to a living personage, so far as successfully defending the charge is concerned. Either accusation is liable to be easily believed by the idle and uninformed, without even a desire or tendency on their part to refute it. In neither case does the indictment run "In the name of His Majesty, etc.," or "In the name of the people, etc.," or "In the name of the Commonwealth, etc.," but in that more simple, quiet, and diabolical form of the inquisition of slander beginning with the words "They say."

They say this white marble image of Abraham Lincoln is inartistic. The physical voice giving this statement utterance was that of a Government clerk, a mere blameless marionette whose simple wax cylinder mind recorded and repeated the impressions made by another.

Being after all the real tribunal in which the character of the object must be examined, the Congress will not on hearing be content with such a general charge of a want of conformity to the principles of art by simply saying it is inartistic, nor will the constant repetition of these words make that the truth which is not the truth.

The constant repetition of a phrase in speeches, poems, hymns, sermons, and in street-car ads, on billboards, and screens has been known to give the temporary appearance of a truth, sufficient to win a presidential election; and we well know we have acted on the suggestion of "Eventually; why not now?" so constantly before us, and taken it for granted that a certain "Castoria" is the "kind we have always bought," a phrase so often repeated that it must be so. And who is it that does not know that while in "the dear damp days beyond recall" the credit should have been given to Val Blatz, nevertheless by continuous and uninterrupted appeals to our eyesight we were convinced that it was not Blatz but Schlitz who made Milwaukee famous. Yet we can not do such violence to our conscience as to permit such practice to predominate in the sciences of painting, architecture, or sculpture.

Furthermore, the qualifications of those who protest in the name of art should be closely scrutinized before serious consideration should be given to their one and only cry. Of what schools of art are they? What entablatures of ancient Greece have they studied? What association have they had with the works of the masters that they may sit in judgment on the works of other men? Can it be shown that the guardians of art in Washington have any more education in sculpture than that offered by a summer's junket at the people's expense from New York to Paris, Rome, and Venice, and back as couriers and cupbearers to a committee of double-breasted United States Senators visiting there to view and sample the fineness of arts, the main result of which being the birth of a persistent and perpetual effort to belittle the sculptored and bronze heroes of the monumental city and to replace them with memorial fountains flowing with aridity and crowded with nudity.

Long ensconcing behind the pillars of pull and preferment soon renders the meekest bureaucrat a grim image of intolerance, whose rules of action become as unchangeable as the Procrustean bed. Pliny says, "Alexander issued an edict that no artist but Appelles should paint him, Pyrgoteles engrave him, and Lysippus make statues in brass of him." So strict were the rules governing artists that even in the Byzantium school an artist who had dared to use the beautiful lines in the marble head of the Grecian Jupiter in the head of the Christ, instead of those prescribed, had to suffer for such an act the amputation of his hand.

Unfortunate would be the dawn of that day when the statuary of Washington City shall either be removed entirely or so judged in the dusk of autocratic ignorance.

But the maligners of this statue of Lincoln, in order to make a case, can not be permitted to rest on a general charge but should be made to specify violations in any conformity with the principles of sculpture.

Even the remote Egyptian times, as depicted in their works of art, demonstrate that the canon of proportions was well known to them; it has been followed through the beautiful marble statuary of Greece and Rome on down to present days. The isosceles triangle of Gibson is a very popular method for the calculations of proportions by sculptors in laying the foundation for a given piece of work. He has not taken his measurements from the average man, but selected the ideal man, borrowing, as the Greeks did, from Adonis, Mercury, Pollix, and Bacchus, taking the head from one, the limbs from another, and the body from a third. Perhaps one of the claims of the lack of conformity of this statue to the principles of art may have reference to its torso or limbs, the wise critic in his observations having used the famous isosceles triangle method, forgetting that the principle involved is not applied to studies from life. The artist who carved this figure knew Lincoln and produced him as from life, in which he had seen him. No claim ever being made that Lincoln had the legs of Adonis, the arms of Mercury, or the fat stomach of Bacchus, it was unnecessary to use the triangle test.

The cruel charge, if any, of the inartistic violation of the ethics of stone by this statue in not maintaining the Lincolnian proportions is therefore quashed and for naught held. The anatomy of the statue, which is one of the principles involved in sculpture, meets the test of the most meticulous criterion.

The principle of drapery is an important branch of the art of sculpture, and it is said that it is far more difficult to produce a statue in clothes than without them. The Phidian marbles are draped with exquisite skill. The drapery of a statue calls into play the highest skill of the sculptor—witness the silk cassock on Muhlenberg in Statuary Hall, the gloves on the hands of General Grant in the Rotunda, and the veil over the face of the nun at the Corcoran Art Gallery. Lincoln in this statue is dressed in his customary habiliments, the conventional unpressed trousers—the pressed article at that date indicating "store clothes," and no orders from London having at that time been received—the familiar Prince Albert coat, open in front; vest; high, rolled soft collar; and large black tie. It is rumored that some enemies of this statue would have been less violent in their campaign, and would have admitted it would have come nearer in meeting the measurements of their ornate minds had Mr. Lincoln been dressed in one of the model and artistic suits of Hart Schaffner & Marx.

There never was a time since the artists of ancient Greece chiseled their work out in the open under the spreading shade trees that they did not have, seated about them, a few laymen of ease who listened to their talk as they worked and admired their genius. So there are here in Washington those who, without talent themselves to paint or carve, delight in lounging about on the studio divans sighing in unison with the artist, synchronizing with his moods, harmonizing with his execrations and, like him, calling down the imprecations of the gods on the heads of the inartistic. With this layman class originated the fable that this beautiful statue of Lincoln was made by a gravestone maker—all this in further damnation of the statue by associating it with the robbing of tombs and the yawning of graveyards. Nothing is further from the truth. I emphatically deny that the maker of this figure was a gravestone maker. I know nothing of the art of a gravestone maker, but of the workmanship of the grave maker who, as Shakespeare tells us, builds stronger than either the mason, the shipwright, or the carpenter, because the houses that he builds last 'til doomsday, there remains no doubt.

But even if the artist had been a humble gravestone maker, one of the common people, who can say the great Lincoln, could he have said so, would not have praised the work the more! Lincoln himself had been a woodchopper. Even Christ found his best disciples among the lowly fishermen. Miss Vinnie Ream, the 18-year-old Government clerk, carved the figure of Lincoln now in the rotunda.

The artist of this figure, Mr. L. Flannery, had a brother and they were in business together under the name of Flannery Bros., but the brother, who was a monument maker, had no hand in the carving of the Lincoln statue.

THE FACE OF THE FIGURE.

The true beauty and correctness of this image of the martyred statesman is to be found, however, in its face. The real test of its artistic merit is: Is it, as Gardner says, a true exponent of the human spirit? And in this face art becomes a true interpreter of nature and gives evidence of the true emotions of the soul.

It must be remembered that the artist himself had resided in Washington all the time that Lincoln was President, and like other citizens was familiar with Lincoln's face and form, Lincoln frequently walking and riding about the city. The orator of the day took occasion to refer to Lincoln's well-known presence in Washington when he exclaimed, "Here he won from all who knew him—and who is there who did not know him?—golden opinions."

No doubt Flannery had often conversed with the President.

There had been a number of models of Lincoln submitted to the committee on award, and this one was selected, from among many, according to Mr. Crosby S. Noyes, father of the present owner, Mr. Theodore W. Noyes, in his paper, the Washington Star, because of its "excellent likeness." The money was raised almost entirely in Washington and was cared for and paid over to the sculptor by such excellent business men as Mr. Noyes, George W. Riggs, founder of the Riggs Bank, B. B. French, commissioner of public buildings, a position requiring him to be almost in daily consultation with the President, and 22 other and excellent business men. It seems reasonable to suppose that had not the statue been a fine likeness, they would have rejected it. One of the most notable things which occurred at the dedication was at the moment of its unveiling, when 20,000 people, struck by the close resemblance between the statue and their then dead friend, cheered vociferously in loud and long approval of the statue and of the artist. No discordant piping voice was heard to say, "It is inartistic."

All of this is sufficient evidence, coming as it does from our fathers, but to satisfy the doubly incredulous there is presented to us a witness—an expert witness—whose dramatic and convincing evidence will satisfy, it would seem, any doubting Thomas who before believing insists on seeing and putting his fingers into the nail prints. Let the witness be called. It is Mr. Freeman Thorp, a portrait artist of many years of national repute, a man over 80 but strong and robust as a youth.

Some time after this statue was taken down Mr. Thorp happened to be in Washington, and being a great authority on Lincoln, having known him personally in his lifetime and done yeoman service for him in Ohio during his campaign for President, he became much interested in the statue, and especially in its whereabouts.

THE EVIDENCE OF FREEMAN THORP.

It was understood that the monument, and especially the figure, was to be carefully preserved, when taken down, in the basement of the courthouse, before which it stood, but such was not the case. For a long while no one knew where it had been taken. The testimony of Mr. Thorp, our witness, and his opinion on the face of the statue appeared in the Evening Star, of Washington, on the 3d day of June, 1921, the editor and owner of which, Mr. Noyes, one of the city's most intelligent and noble citizens, who has worked untiringly to restore this monument, and is as follows:

THE LINCOLN STATUE—AN ACCURATE LIKENESS OF THE MARTYRED PRESIDENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE STAR:

Commending your editorial on the Lincoln statue, I desire to say that after a tedious search I have found the statue that was removed from its site in front of the courthouse. It is down near the river, in the rear of the old Bureau of Engraving, not stored at all, but lying outdoors roughly crated.

I do not know who chiseled the head and face, but it was accurately done by some one who studied Lincoln from life, as I did, and was not done from photographs. It is a better likeness of Lincoln than anything in plaster, stone, marble, or bronze that I have seen, and I have seen about all that have been made. Some have been made that are unquestionably great works of art, but the best of them are not accurate likenesses of him. This one is to those who, like myself, knew Lincoln pleasing to look at, because it is accurately modeled, and in its simple truth is in keeping with the unassuming man we loved.

FREEMAN THORP.

Such is the convincing evidence of a portrait artist of national reputation.

A sample of his work hangs in the lobby of this House in the oil painting of the Hon. Schuyler Colfax, Speaker of this House at the very time this statue was unveiled. Thorp's oil painting of Lincoln from life has recently been hung by order of the Senate in the main hall of the Senate wing not far from the main door. To many of us he has exhibited a pencil sketch of Lincoln's face made by him at Gettysburg at the time Lincoln delivered his famous address.

Mr. Thorp told me that he found the Lincoln with upturned face, covered partially with an old piece of gunnysack which he drew aside, disclosing dust and rainspots. With his handkerchief he wiped away the stains from the pure white marble and again the wonderful face of the Lincoln he had known more than half a century before gazed kindly upon him.

The resemblance to Lincoln was startling. The statue seemed almost to speak, and, quoting Pope, "the cold marble softened into life, grew warm." It was not hard to believe that the lips trembled and moved and that one heard the words, "With malice toward none and charity for all."

Thorp leaned over and looked into the fine face of the marble and there he recognized every line that had existed in life, and all of which, in combination, told the story of Lincoln's life and revealed those attributes which made him the permanent leader of his time and the exemplar of all time.

The marks of early poverty and adversity, deeply seated, were yet overcast with deeper furrows of power and confidence, yet all crowned with a nobility of intellectuality, sincere, affectionate—the incarnation of courage, the beatification of benevolence.

INFLUENCE OF POPULAR MARBLES.

John Ruskin says:

The sculptor does not work for the anatomist but for the common observer of life and nature.

The art of the ancients reached down into the common understanding of the people and its plea to them concerned the highest and noblest aims of their country. Xerxes, the Persian conqueror, perceiving this silent appeal and influence, dismantled the statuary and pulled down the temples in Greece, and the first measures Darius took to suppress insurrection among his victims was to raze their temples and statuary.

On the other hand, recognizing the influence of the marble, Augustus had statues erected in honor of the heroes of the Empire and who deserved the recognition of their country. His theory, and it seems a wise one, was that such a course was not only an acknowledgment of a debt owing by the nation but stimulated others to like heroic acts for the Empire. To elevate the warrior, the founder, or savior of a nation in the imagination of the people above the ordinary grade of people is a custom which has been handed down from generation to generation from the earliest periods of human history. By word of mouth, by pencil, by brush, by the chisel, has this work of immortalization gone on.

And so this exquisite white figure more than 53 years ago stepped into its position on its pedestal in front of the temple of justice and in the plaza of the city, fresh hewed, in the feelings and thoughts of the time, to become the object of admiration of the masses. Criticized? Yes; and so was the disk thrower by Myron, now and for centuries regarded as perfection in marble, and by contemporaries was declared a distortion and an overelaboration. Its artist creator in penury? Yes; but Phideas himself, known as the "sculptor of the gods," died in prison, an exile from Athens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield me a little more time, so that I may finish to-night?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. KING. I think I can finish in 10 minutes. I thank the gentleman.

Powerful as was its face, yet it was, so to speak, the ensemble of all its beauties as a whole, that this statue spoke most strongly. As Pope, in his essay on art, says:

'Tis not the lips, or eye, we beauty call,
But the joint force and true result of all.

The whole design stood for something—the Nation. To gaze at it meant that one could not help being a better citizen and to rejoice that he was a brother citizen of Abraham Lincoln. The white figure seemed to symbolize the power of union, the strength of constitutions, and the permanency of republics, and the eternity of justice.

While standing before this statue in veneration, how many of us have been impelled to call to memory those eloquent words of Charles Sumner from his funeral oration on Lincoln at Boston:

Such a character awakened instinctively the sympathy of the people. They saw his fellow feeling with them and felt the kinship. With him as President, the idea of republican institutions, where no place is too high for the humblest, was perpetually manifest, so that his simple presence was like a proclamation of the equality of all men.

WHY IT WAS PLACED SO HIGH.

This statue of Lincoln stood high, but was it not this same spirit that has always incited humanity to lift aloft the images of its heroes and martyrs and gods that prompted the spirit of the city of Washington to raise this figure so high? The Greeks raised the statue of their favorite goddess Minerva to a height of 70 feet. It was the prevailing custom of the time to place statues on high columns. The statue of General Brock on the Canadian side near the Niagara Rapids, the Duke of York and Duke of Wellington columns in London will be confirmatory of this statement. According to the theory of our Fine Arts Commission, the figure was placed high because it was a little larger than life size to the observer. Such is the habit of theory. More than once it has been intimated that it was placed high to protect it against the acts of miscreants and enemies of Lincoln, there being some remaining in 1868.

It is indeed enlightening to get the true story of why Flannery placed this figure of Lincoln on such a high pedestal or column. About a year ago a reporter of the Baltimore Sun visited the old artist in his shack, not far from the Capitol, for the purpose of obtaining a human interest story about the celebrated statue. He found Flannery lying on a cot. He was very old, weary, and faint, even then—

The ebb and the flow of his aged blood
Were playing the game of eternity,
Whether his soul should ride in with the flood
Or adventurously on out to sea.

The reporter, as he told me, asked Flannery why he chose to place the statue on such a high pedestal.

Slowly and painfully the sculptor raised himself upon his elbow and with difficulty said:

Young man, on the evening of April 14, 1864, I was occupying a seat in Ford's Theater. Arriving early I witnessed the President and his party come in and enter the upper right-hand box amid the cheers of the audience. A number of times I observed the President's face as he sat on the side of the box nearest the audience.

Suddenly, while engrossed with the lines of the single actor then occupying the stage and in the middle of the second scene of the third act, a pistol shot rang out. I looked at the President's box. His head had fallen forward. He had been hit.

Instantly the figure of a man sprang from the box upon the stage and escaped across it.

I lived through the days and nights of gloom following the assassination. As to everyone else it was a personal lamentation. And when it fell to me to carve and erect this statue, I resolved and did place it so high that no assassin's hand could ever again strike him down.

THE PLACE.

The citizens of Washington, who originated, bought, and paid for this monument, desired it placed in front of the courthouse in Judiciary Park, as the fittest and most public place in the city and where its patriotic influences might be felt by the greatest number of persons. This spot was in the center of a busy mart, the seat of judicial sales of real estate and personal property, the latter kind sometimes, in the now forgotten past, including the human commodity.

Congress had no authority to locate it, just as Congress has no power to remove it now, the jurisdiction over the courthouse grounds then being in the mayor and the city council of the city of Washington. This city gave its authority to place the monument before the city hall and courthouse with the implied trust, no doubt, that it should remain inviolate. And the then government of Washington city, having full authority, confirmed and recognized the perpetual easement granted the monument association for the location of the statue by setting off the ground upon which it stood and surrounding it by an iron fence at the cost to the city of Washington of $800.

The monument association and its successors hold the right of easement in the plot of ground so set off, and those who reached up their long arms to pull the statue down were not alone iconoclasts but trespassers. It is a sacred spot in that it has held the statue of the great martyr so long. It likewise marks the place where the historical events taking place at the time of the dedication and where the feet of our ancestors have trod.

It is more than a statue. It is a landmark, and as such deserves that repose and veneration which has always, almost to worship, been the rule of nations from archaic times to now. Monuments were built from earliest times to designate where great events had taken place. Simple heaps of rock or large stones—but all this to the populace had the deepest meaning.

Jacob marked the place at Bethel where he had seen the angels "ascending and descending" his ladder, and the place of making his contract with Laban was commemorated in the same way. Rachel's grave was so marked.

AFTER ALL, SENTIMENT RULES.

From antiquity the human race has been taught to revere its monuments. Solomon, the son of David, even now exhorts us to "Remove not the ancient landmark which thy fathers have set."

The young man who was instructed to tell one of our committees that the statue was inartistic inadvertently murmured that he believed there was "some sentiment" connected with its removal. In addition to having a belief to that effect, he now knows, and his sponsors know, that there is a good deal of sentiment involved. He knows now that his rash statement pertaining to art in sculpture is repudiated by facts and overwhelmed by millions in this country, who, when the subject of Lincoln is touched, however small may be the features, are the sentimental defenders of every atom of his history and of every infinitesimal trace of his memory.

Sentiment opposed to the removal! What does the cold and dry pedant embalmed in civil service know of sentiment? In his cloistered confines he imagines true art is created not by merit but by his opinion. This is artistic, says he. Therefore it is artistic. And for him who dares protest or doubt, there is the case of Apollodorus, the architect, who incited the hate of and was put to death by Marcus Aurelius because he had been so indiscreet as to pick a flaw in a temple the drawings of which had been prepared by the Emperor himself.

Sentiment! Thackeray says—

Without sentiment there would be no flower in life at all.

No doubt our learned friend has discovered more sentiment involved in the situation than seemed to exist at first blush. He knows that the demolition and removal of this simple statue has aroused the people like no other single deed has done for years. Legislature after legislature has resolved against the sacrilege. Civic organizations have remonstrated. The remaining members of the Grand Army of the Republic have protested. The Loyal Legion, the Aztec Club, the Sons of the American Revolution, and President Harding himself have all implored that the statue might be restored to its original place.

Sentiment! Let our friend read history, and from its pages he can cull the fact that the peoples of the world have always resented, as a matter of sentiment, the removal and change of the location of their statues and monuments to their heroes and benefactors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, may I have permission to proceed for a few minutes?

Mr. FESS. For how long a time?

Mr. KING. Say five minutes.

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. KING. Thank you.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman intend to explain the picture?

Mr. KING. This line represents where the old statue stood, and this presents the height of the statue as it would be with the new pedestal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the reconstructed monument?

Mr. KING. Yes. It is not proposed by anybody who is interested to erect this old pedestal. It would not have been so ungainly but for the fact that a mayor had cut down the street. This is the figure which is proposed and to which I have been addressing myself.

Mr. DENISON. How high was the original statue?

Mr. KING. About 40 feet.

Mr. DENISON. And how high is it proposed to erect it at this time?

Mr. KING. I have not the data on that. Possibly 20 feet.

Mr. DENISON. Can the gentleman state where the statue is now?

Mr. KING. As described in this statement I read here a while ago, by Mr. Thorp, it is down back of the old Bureau of Engraving and Printing, near the river. It was exposed, and through the efforts of two or three people, Colonel Sherrill put it into a box and planked it over. The pedestal lies alongside of it.

Mr. BIRD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. If the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the committee, will permit me to finish.

Mr. BIRD. Did I understand the gentleman to say that Congress was without authority in taking it down?

Mr. KING. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. BIRD. If without authority in that, how could they give the authority to put it up?

Mr. KING. The government of the District of Columbia has changed. It is under the authority of Congress now, but was not at that time.

The Romans were especially jealous of their works of art. Tiberius, unknown to them, removed to his own palace a statue by Lysippus of an athlete annointing himself, and which had been standing in the baths of Agrippa, to which the public had access, and which, like Lincoln's first statue, was considered as belonging to the people. On their discovery of the removal, the populace showed its disapproval so fiercely that Tiberius became alarmed lest the people should revolt and was compelled to give up his object and replace the statue in its original place and thus appease the people.

For more than 900 years the magnificent statue of the Olympian Jupiter by Phideas stood in the sacred grove of Altis. Caligula desired to transport it to Rome. This desire gave great umbrage to the Grecian people, who had admired and worshiped it for centuries. So great was the remonstrance that he was compelled to abandon his enterprise.

Are all our hero statues to come down within the city? Du Pont has gone. Lincoln is down, and the chalk mark for destruction has been placed upon the statue of Admiral Farragut.

Before we let any commission proceed further on such a wild program let us remember that it is a well-known fact that the decadency of some of the richest and most powerful nations on earth began with a disrespect for statuary. It is related that Athenian youths, exhilarated by nectars brewed in their homes, in their nightly perambulations persisted in knocking the noses from the faces of the defenseless marble figures that marked the gardens and thoroughfares of that ancient city. As Rome conquered and the surrounding country succumbed, the peoples lost their monuments and statuary, 300 statues at one time being taken from the island of Rhodes to Rome. Nero, the tyrant, robbed the temple of Apollo at Delphi of 500 bronze statues, which he removed and placed in his celebrated palace on Palatine Hill.

And so Rome, in turn, witnessed the commencement of her decline in the removal of her statues. The Goth sacked Rome and finally set fire to it. The former citizens of Rome, now a ragged and unfortunate mob, sought for safety the mausoleum of Hadrian, and there, typical of their final destruction and in the last efforts to save their lives, threw down the magnificent statues which crowded the top of the mausoleum on the heads of their enemy tormentors, crowded beneath the walls.

REERECT THE STATUE OF LINCOLN.

No greater opportunity was ever given a group of men to right a wrong than is here offered us to-day.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. While we are taking down these works of art in our own Capital, American funds are being used to restore the old temple of Apollo at Delphi.

Mr. KING. I thank the gentleman for the information.

There is no Member of this House who does not feel a personal affection for the memory of Abraham Lincoln, and how can articulate expression be better given to that love than by a vote of "yea" upon this resolution, which will raise his marble image from the ground, reerect and rededicate it to posterity? [Applause.]

HISTORICAL MATTER IN REGARD TO FIRST STATUE OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, prior to certain remarks in support of House Joint Resolution No. 127, to reerect the first statue of Abraham Lincoln, the House granted unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD certain material historical data, which I herewith append:

[From the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., Wednesday, April 15, 1868.]

THE DEATH OF LINCOLN—TRIBUTE OF THE CITIZENS OF WASHINGTON TO HIS MEMORY—THE CEREMONIES TO-DAY—DEDICATION OF THE LINCOLN MONUMENT—MASONIC CEREMONIES—UNVEILING OF THE STATUE—ADDRESS OF HON. B. B. FRENCH.

Three years ago this morning, at 7 o'clock, Abraham Lincoln breathed his last. The anniversary of that sorrowful day will be marked in various ways throughout the country, but nowhere with deeper feeling than in the city of Washington, where the martyred dead is remembered with so much of personal respect and affection. The department business is suspended to-day, as well as that of the municipal offices, and the public schools are closed in order to afford opportunity to all to witness the dedication of the monument to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, raised by the citizens of Washington in front of the city hall. Flags are displayed at half-mast, and the heavy boom of half-hour guns serve to remind the most thoughtless of the solemnity of the occasion. The morning opened dark and gloomy, but lightened up to some extent as the hour for the dedication ceremonies approached.

THE LINCOLN NATIONAL MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

At this time it may be of interest to give a brief history of the association through whose instrumentality the present monument to the memory of Abraham Lincoln was raised. In April, 1865, on motion of Mr. N. D. Larner, of the city councils, a joint committee was appointed by the councils to take action in reference to the erection of a monument in the city of Washington to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. This committee met at the mayor's office on the 28th of April, 1865, and formed itself into an association to be called the Lincoln National Monument Association, to carry out the objects proposed by the formation of the committee. Subsequently, the following officers were elected for the association: President, Richard Wallach, mayor; secretary, Crosby S. Noyes; treasurer, George W. Riggs; directors, Joseph F. Brown, Asbury Lloyd, John B. Turton, Dr. W. G. H. Newman, George H. Plant, Z. Richards, N. D. Larner, E. C. Carrington, John P. Pepper, S. J. Bowen, George F. Gulick, B. B. French, George R. Ruff, Charles C. Morris, John G. Dudley, John H. Semmes, James Kelley, William P. Ferguson, S. P. Brown, Dr. C. H. Nichols, Henry Addison, William H. Tenney.

To these were added a number of honorary directors, mostly Members of Congress, one from each State, as it was hoped at that time to secure a national subscription to the end of raising a monument at the National Capitol, the most suitable place, properly commemorative of the life and character of the lamented deceased. Owing, however, to the springing up of kindred associations in almost every State and city in the country, this hope was not realized, and with the exception of some contributions from Baltimore, among which was a handsome sum from John T. Ford, Esq., the proceeds of a benefit for the monument fund, given at his Baltimore theater, little, if anything was contributed outside of Washington. The money raised was, however, carefully husbanded, and was invested by the treasurer, Mr. Riggs, in Government registered bonds. The sum raised was, of course, inadequate to erect a monument on anything like the scale originally proposed, but was yet sufficient to raise a monument in the shape of a shaft and statue, creditable to the city; and it was determined by the association that this was the best course to pursue. Mr. Lot Flannery, of this city, who has achieved a number of successes in his art, among which is the admired monument over the victims of the arsenal explosion at the Congressional Cemetery, was the successful competitor for the work and the result is before the public.

THE MONUMENT.

The monument is about 40 feet in height to the top of the statue. It rests on a solid foundation of blue rock 6 feet in depth. The base is an octagon, 6 feet in height and about 7 feet from side to side, on which the base of the column rests, the lower part corresponding with the base and the upper part with the shaft, being circular and molded. The shaft is 18 feet in height, with an average diameter of 3 feet (tapering), and is surmounted by a molded cap, 4 feet square and 2 feet thick, on which rests the base of the statue and the statue itself. The figure at this height looks to be about life-size, and stands facing south. It represents Lincoln standing with his left hand resting on the emblem of Union—the Roman facile—his head erect, with a slight inclination forward, and right hand partially open, as in the attitude he was wont to take in addressing an audience. The design was first made in clay by Mr. Flannery last summer, and was subsequently cast in plaster. The model attracted much attention as a spirited design and excellent likeness. The encomiums bestowed upon his design induced him to submit it to the managers of the Monument Association, and the result was that it was unanimously selected from the various designs and models before the committee as the best offered. A contract was entered into with him by which he agreed to have the monument ready by the 15th of April, 1868, the anniversary of Mr. Lincoln's death. He has since devoted himself to the work, and the reproduction in marble is held to be greatly superior to the model. Last night between 7 and 8 o'clock the veiled statue was removed from the studio of Mr. Flannery, on Massachusetts Avenue, to the site of the monument in front of the City Hall. It had been designed to raise it to its pedestal last night, to be in readiness for the ceremonies of to-day, but in consequence of the unfavorable weather and the darkness of the night it was thought prudent to postpone an undertaking of so much delicacy until daylight. This morning it was safely raised to the top of the column upon which it is to stand. Some little work yet remains to be done about the base of the monument, which it is proposed to extend with the beautiful Tennessee marble, and an iron railing is to be placed around the monument, resting on a substantial foundation of stone.

HOISTING OF THE STATUE AND PREPARATIONS.

The statue was not moved from the studio until late yesterday afternoon, and it was landed near the pedestal about 6 o'clock, where it remained during the night in charge of some of the workmen and a small detail of police to prevent curious parties from interfering with the covering, the design being to keep it veiled until the time arrived for throwing it off. At daylight this morning the Messrs. Flannery were on the ground with their force, and the ropes being made fast to the statue, it was set securely on the top of the pedestal by 7 o'clock. Even at this hour there were quite a number of persons present anxious to get a glimpse of it, but in this they were disappointed.

Subsequently the hoisting apparatus, which was kindly loaned the artist by Captain Mullet, architect of the Treasury extension, and Mr. Clark, architect of the Capitol, was so placed as not to obscure the view, the time being so short that it could not be removed altogether.

Messrs. Downing & Bro. were also early on the ground with a force of workmen, and during the forenoon had a platform erected, 64 feet in length, 16 feet deep, and 6 feet in height, for the accommodation of those invited to be present.

THE PROCESSION.

The procession formed at the corner of Ninth and D Streets, and about 1.30 o'clock the line of march was taken up, when some of the members of No. 2 Steam Engine Co. commenced to fire a salute from a field-piece in front of the engine house. The right of the line was by the Grand Lodge of Masons, with members of the subordinate lodges, marshaled by A. M. Howard and headed by the Marine Band. The Sons of Temperance and Good Templars followed, Mr. John S. Hollingshead marshaling the former, assisted by George D. Egleston, of Metropolitan Division, W. H. Gonzalves, W. H. Harrison, C. H. Frost, J. S. Erly, J. W. Roberts, of Good Samaritan, and W. H. Chase. The band of the Twelfth United States Infantry headed the Sons, the Grand Lodge having the right of the line, followed by delegates of all the subordinate divisions. The beautiful flag of Federal City and fine banner of Good Samaritan Divisions were in line.

The Temple of Honor followed, marshaled by J. S. Stokes.

The Good Templars came next, the Grand Lodge being at the right of the line, followed by a number of the members of the subordinate lodges, marshaled by W. P. White, C. T. of Harmony Lodge, headed by Heald's Band of 17 pieces.

The Grand Lodge of the United States of the Knights of Pythias, now holding a session at Odd Fellows' Hall, Navy Yard, formed at the hall and with members of the subordinate lodges marched direct to the City Hall, reaching the grounds before the main procession arrived.

AT THE CITY HALL.

During the forenoon workmen were busily engaged in erecting a stand between the monument and the curbstone, 52 by 16 feet, capable of seating about 400 persons. From the flagstaff on the City Hall the national colors were displayed at half-mast, and the corporation offices were all closed at 12 o'clock. The large derrick had been removed from over the monument, and everything in readiness for the ceremony before 1 o'clock. The crowd began to gather about 12 o'clock, and in less than an hour the steps and portico of the City Hall were densely packed.

By 2 o'clock the entire space in front of the City Hall was crowded, while the housetops and windows of the houses opposite were filled with human beings. All the sanitary police, under Lieutenant Noonan, were on duty. No one was allowed upon the stand except those who had been invited by the committee. About 400 invitations were issued by Mayor Wallach and the committee to Cabinet ministers, heads of bureaus, Army and Navy officers, members of the Diplomatic Corps, and other distinguished persons. Invitations were also issued to the Senate and House of Representatives, but owing to the impeachment trial it was impossible for them to attend. Mayor Wallach this morning received the following letter from Speaker Colfax:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 13, 1868.

RICHARD WALLACH, Esq.,
Chairman, etc.

SIR: I am directed by the House of Representatives, before whom I have this day laid your invitation to be present on the occasion of unveiling and dedicating the statue of the late President Abraham Lincoln, to inform you that on account of a standing order requiring their presence in the Senate Chamber at the time indicated they are compelled to decline the same.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Among those present were President Johnson, accompanied by Colonel Rives and Mr. Kershaw; Baron Gerolt, Mr. Rangabee, the Grecian minister; Major General Hancock and General Mitchell, General Emory, Colonel Capron, commissioner of agriculture; Ambrosio Abeita, Alexandro Padilla, governor of the Pueblos of Isleta (one of the 19 villages of the tribe in New Mexico); John Ward, agent; Gen. O. O. Howard, Mr. Cantazalli, secretary Italian Legation; Admiral Radford, Assistant Attorney General Binckley, Gen. Charles Thomas and Gen. Morris S. Miller, General Carr, of General Emory's staff; Gen. S. F. Carey, of Ohio; John Hitz, Esq.; Dr. John B. Blake.

General Grant was present and occupied a position on the sidewalk in front of Mr. Bradley's office, declining to take a seat upon the stand.

THE CROWD.

The assemblage was very large, and commenced to assemble in front of the city hall long before the hour for the ceremonies. At 2 p. m. the crowd, despite the rain, had so increased as to extend down Four-and-a-half Street below the Presbyterian Church, down Louisiana Avenue beyond Fifth Street, and an equal distance down Indiana Avenue. The open space at the intersection of these streets was densely packed, and the steps, areas, roof, and windows of the City Hall Building were closely occupied. The roofs and windows of all the buildings in the neighborhood were thronged, and the boys, as usual, secured eligible positions in the treetops. The attendance of colored people was very large, filling the space in the rear of the stand. There were probably from 15,000 to 20,000 present. It was undoubtedly the largest gathering of people ever assembled in Washington on such an occasion.

THE PROGRAM.

The following was the program of the ceremonies: Prayer by Reverend Doctor Hamilton; music by the Twelfth Infantry Band; dedication of the statue by the Masonic fraternity; music by the Marine Band; address by B. B. French, Esq.; music by Twelfth Infantry Band; unveiling of the statue by the President of the United States; music by the Marine Band; introduction of the artist; benediction.

THE CEREMONIES.

After the arrival of the procession on the ground and order had been restored, Mayor Wallach presiding, Rev. Dr. William Hamilton offered up a fervent prayer. After the band of the Twelfth United States Infantry had performed "The Heart Bowed Down," from the "Bohemian Girl," the dedication ceremonies followed.

THE MASONIC DEDICATION.

The Masonic order proceeded to perform the dedicatory services of the craft, as follows:

GRAND MASTER (Benjamin B. French). Right Worshipful Junior Grand Warden, what is the jewel of your office?

JUNIOR GRAND WARDEN (Joseph B. Will). The plumb, Most Worshipful.

GRAND MASTER. Have you applied the plumb to such parts of the base of this pedestal as should be plumb?

JUNIOR GRAND WARDEN (applying the plumb). I have, Most Worshipful, and the craftsmen have done their duty.

GRAND MASTER. Right Worshipful Senior Grand Warden, what is the jewel of your office?

SENIOR GRAND WARDEN (John H. Russell). The level, Most Worshipful.

GRAND MASTER. Have you applied the level to such parts of the base of this pedestal as should be level?

SENIOR GRAND WARDEN (applying the level). I have, Most Worshipful, and the craftsmen have done their duty.

GRAND MASTER. Right Worshipful Deputy Grand Master, you will now apply the proper architectural instrument to the base of this pedestal and see if the several angles thereof are duly and properly formed.

DEPUTY GRAND MASTER (John Lockie) (applying the level). Most Worshipful Grand Master, I have applied the level to the several angles of the base of this pedestal, and find that the craftsmen have done their duty.

GRAND MASTER. As the implements of architecture in the hands of the skillful operative mason enable him to prepare and adjust the sundry materials of which the complete structure is composed, so do they, in the hands of enlightened and accepted speculative masons, teach them to prepare their minds as living stones for that spiritual building, that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

(The deputy grand master presented the corn.)

GRAND MASTER. Brethren, the corn, wine, and oil, which you carry in your processions and which are the consecrating elements used on occasions like this, are to remind us that in the pilgrimage of life we are to impart a portion of our bread to the hungry, to send a cup of our wine to cheer the sorrowful, and to pour the healing oil of consolation into the wounds which sickness hath made in the bodies or affliction hath rent in the hearts of our fellow men.

In placing the corn upon the foundation of this statue I invoke the blessing of plenty on the people of this city and upon the people of our whole country. Especially may they never want for that bread for which to eat is life eternal.

(The senior grand warden presented the wine.)

GRAND MASTER. In pouring the wine upon it, I do it in the fervent hope that the wine of joy may ever gladden the hearts of the people everywhere.

(The junior grand warden presented the oil.)

GRAND MASTER. In pouring oil upon the foundation of this statue, I hope and pray that its healing element may spread all over the face of this land and, like oil upon the troubled waters, calm the waves of discord and be conducive to that peace, harmony, brotherly love, and sincere affection, assuring happiness to all, that we believe would have rejoiced the heart of the good man whose semblance it supports had the will of God been that he should have lived to look once more upon a united people.

May the consolation of the gospel of the Prince of Peace accompany us all through life and illuminate our pathway as we pass through the dark valley of the shadow of death.

The grand master gave three raps with his gavel on the foundation and made the announcement: "I now pronounce this foundation properly prepared, well laid, true and trusty; and this statue, erected by the citizens of Washington to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, duly and fully dedicated to the American people." [Applause.]

The Marine Band then performed the Miserere from "Trovatore."

ADDRESS BY B. B. FRENCH, ESQ.

B. B. French, Esq., the orator of the day, then addressed the assemblage, as follows:

We have met here this day, my fellow citizens, to dedicate to the people of the United States here, in the central part of their own Capital, the form and semblance of one who they dearly loved in life, and whose memory they can never cease to revere; who three years ago this day yielded up his life a martyr to his love of his country, his love of his fellow men, and his unshaken confidence in the affection and reverence for his person of all around him.

The statue which we now inaugurate is emphatically the offering of the citizens of Washington to the memory of the man whose form and features it represents.

In April, 1865, the councils of the city adopted a resolution unanimously appointing a committee to consist of the mayor and three members of each board for the purpose of forming a Washington Lincoln Monument Association. That committee, in conformity with the resolution, elected a large number of their most respectable citizens, who, with the original committee, formed the association, with the Hon. Richard Wallach, mayor, as president; C. S. Noyes, Esq., as secretary; and George W. Riggs, Esq., as treasurer. Subscriptions were solicited from the citizens of Washington and a sum sufficient to secure the erection of the statue was obtained. A contract was entered into with Mr. Lot Flannery, of Washington, to furnish the statue, and it now stands before you the work of his hands.

Who can ever forget that night of horror when the awful intelligence was borne by the telegraphic wires all through the land that Abraham Lincoln had been struck down by the hands of an assassin?

"Oh, night of woe,
How are you joined with hell in triple knot."

And that day of grief which followed, when the messenger of death went forth with the sad tidings that our good President was no longer on earth—can it be forgotten? There is not one within the reach of my voice—and I think I may truly add, there is not one in this broad land—to whom it is not a wonder and a mystery how the people bore up as they did under so terrible, so appalling a calamity. But they did bear up, and although the President whom they almost adored was dead, the Nation lived. And let me say here that I believe nothing save the final disruption of "the great globe itself" can destroy this Nation. The providence of God watches over us, sustains us through all our trials, and will preserve us as a free and independent people through all time.

It does not require any monument or any words to perpetuate the memory of that great and good and pure man. Monumental marble may crumble into dust; bronze may melt away; granite may perish from the earth; but the memory of Abraham Lincoln shall live in human bosoms and be perpetuated on the living pages of history as long as any nation or people shall exist on earth. [Applause.]

But it is a satisfaction and a pleasure, tinged with melancholy, to look upon that venerated form and to view those features which, whatever else they may indicate, if true to the life, will glow with goodness, kindness, and love, and whereon never rested for a moment a single characteristic other than such as gave outward proof of a good and loving heart, a conscience void of offense, and charity toward all mankind. Oh, heaven, that such a man should have died in such a time and in such a manner!

I hardly know, my fellow citizens, where to begin on an occasion like this. Although the field is ample it has been thoroughly gleaned by the pen of the historian and the harvest has been garnered in the bosoms of a loving people. Still I am aware of your affection for his memory, and that you never tire in listening to a rehearsal of his virtues. [Cries of "Never!"]

Abraham Lincoln was unlike any other man. He seemed to be born to fill the very station he occupied for the last five years of his life and the faith that was in us stands firm to this day that he alone could have carried the country safely through the awful perils that beset it while he filled the responsible and dangerous position of Chief Magistrate. [Cries of "That's so."] We can say of him with as much truth as it was said of one of the greatest and best of English statesmen, he was, indeed—

The pilot weathered the storm.

Let us attempt to analyze the man. He was possessed of a heart as pure as the snowflake as it falls from above. Although of great simplicity of mind and manner, there was in that mind a penetration which seemed to read the very thoughts of others, and which spoke through the eye in language more powerful than could be uttered in words, a defiance to anyone who sought to deceive him. I have heard it called "shrewdness." It was more than shrewdness, and I hardly know how otherwise to characterize it, but in the strong language of the Apostle, as the "sword of the Spirit," for as I have myself seen the searching, powerful, inquisitive expression of that remarkable eye when turned upon one whose statement the President had cause to doubt, it has seemed to me to pierce the buckler of deception through and through, and that the wearer was conscious of his discomfiture before a word was uttered.

With a disposition as genial as a bright May morning, with a temper that could hardly be ruffled by the most untoward circumstances, with a soul absolutely beaming through the eyes, with an affection that captivated everyone, he was possessed of a firmness of purpose, in his determination to do right, that could not be overcome.

Pride of place was unknown to his character. To him that spark of the eternal which gleamed in the bosom of the most humble shone as bright as if it animated the breast of the proudest and highest in the land; and the widow and the fatherless ever found a ready listener to the tale of distress, and never left him without words of consolation and acts which spoke louder than words.

Even the language he used was as peculiar to him as was any other peculiarity of his nature—terse, pointed, plain; never wandering among the mazes of rhetoric after adornment, but simple as the man himself, and going as straight to the mark at which he aimed as an arrow from the bow of Tell. Solomon in all his glory of his proverbs might have envied him had he lived in these days of diffusive writing and still more diffusive speaking.

That single sentence in his last inaugural coming up undefiled from the pure well of his noble heart—"With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in"—spoke the character of the man, and will live among the sayings of great and good men as long as human lips can speak or types can print; and as we read it now we can scarcely repress a tear as we reflect how soon after it was said the voice that said it was silenced forever, and the work that he was in was finished.

The first we know of Abraham Lincoln as a national man is that he came into the House of Representatives of the United States as a Member from Illinois at the first session of the Thirtieth Congress on the first Monday of December, 1847. He served through that Congress without any particular distinction, except that he was regarded as an honest, kind-hearted, genial, mirth-loving man, popular with all who knew him, and the few speeches he then made indicated a man of no inconsiderable talent. But no one, as I think, mistrusted the hidden mine of ability which existed under the unpretending exterior.

In the spirited canvass between him and the lamented Douglas, in 1858, he so conducted his part in the controversy as to convince his eloquent and talented competitor that he had "a foeman worthy of his steel," and the eyes of the whole people were turned upon him as "the rising man."

Whenever the people begin really to love a man, when he has fairly stolen away their hearts, they invariably bestow upon him a pet name. I believe I may say that the homelier the name the better the individual is beloved. So we find in the annals of those days that "Honest Old Abe," as a synonym for Abraham Lincoln, began to be a household phrase. There is probably no better indication of the love of the people—the real genuine affection of the masses—for men than in this pet nomenclature that they give. We can readily call to mind "The Father of his Country," "The Mill Boy of the Slashes," "Old Hickory," "The Defender of the Constitution," "Old Zack," with his "little more grape, Captain Bragg," "Old Ironsides," and many more. But we must return to the subject of our remarks.

In 1860 Abraham Lincoln was nominated as the Republican candidate for President of the United States, and the nomination was hailed throughout the loyal portion of the Union with an enthusiasm that gave assurance that he was truly the candidate of the friends of the Federal Government. He was triumphantly elected, and his election was, as we all know, the signal for the commencement of that dreadful effort to dissolve the Union that ended in four years of disastrous war and the final triumph of the Old Flag, but at a terrible sacrifice of human life and an immense expense of national treasure. Through this fratricidal war Abraham Lincoln stood at the head of the Government, calm, cool, firm, and determined. Ever hopeful in the darkest hours of the struggle and never for a moment ceasing to place his trust in that—

Divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough hew them how we will.

But the history of those dreadful years has been so many times written, and is so familiar to you all, that it would be a trespass upon your time and patience to repeat it here. I shall, therefore, content myself by saying that President Lincoln was found grandly equal to the great trust reposed in him, and performed every duty with a heroic firmness which met the admiration of all his friends.

But, while I refrain from recapitulating to you the public history that marked the momentous era of his term of office, I will endeavor to interest you by relations touching his more private life and character, some of which, in consequence of the official relations which for nearly his entire occupancy of the presidential chair existed between us, are probably known to no other person. No week passed that I did not see him, and I was often with him many times a week. This, of course, with a man like him led to numerous conversations between us and enabled me, with no particular intention of doing so, to observe the peculiar characteristics of Mr. Lincoln.

I will take the liberty, however, before commencing that part of my address to give you a brief account of the inauguration ceremonies of March 4, 1861, as written down by myself at the time, I having been honored with the chief marshalship of the occasion:

"At a few minutes after 11, the procession being formed in line in front of the City Hall, wheeled out into column of march and moved toward Willard's. In front of Willard's it again formed into line and so remained until 10 minutes past 12, where President Buchanan, who had been detained at the Capitol by official duty, arrived. He, with President Lincoln, Colonel Baker, and Mr. Pearce, of the Senate, then took their seats in an open carriage, which was received into the column of march with a proper salute from the military, music, and the cheering of the populace. The column then moved toward the Capitol. No more imposing or more orderly pageant ever passed along Pennsylvania Avenue. At the north door of the Capitol the President and President elect were received and escorted in. In a few minutes they, with their attendants, appeared on the platform of the eastern portico, when Mr. Lincoln delivered his inaugural and was sworn into office. * * *

"The inauguration ceremonies over, we escorted the new President to the White House, where he received all comers with that cordial welcome that so strongly marks the sincerity of the man.

"In the procession was a triumphal car splendidly trimmed, ornamented, and arranged, in which rode 34 young girls. On our return the girls all alighted, and I conducted them in and introduced them to the President. He wished to be allowed to kiss them all, and did so. It was a very interesting scene and elicited much applause." The kisses bestowed by that good man on those young lips will only be forgotten when death has set his seal upon them. Such was the peaceful inauguration of Abraham Lincoln, which so many had prophesied could never be accomplished without the shedding of human blood! What I shall now say is from memoranda made at the time.

In August, 1862, just before the Second Battle of Bull Run, in a conversation with the President, he asked me my age. I gave it to him, when he remarked, with much emphasis, "10 years older than I am, and 10 years younger." I replied that he must not view his own years so disparagingly, when he repeated, "Yes, Mr. French, I am actually 10 years older than you are, the cares and troubles that are upon me are aging me rapidly—I feel it, and you will live to see me in my coffin." This was said with deep solemnity, so much so that I felt sad and tried to speak cheering words. Never in all my intercourse with Mr. Lincoln, except on this occasion and upon the death of his son William, did I witness any manifestation in words of despondency or grief. When Willie died, although he bore himself like a man and a Christian, his affections would assume their control over his sterner self at times and nature have her way.

As an evidence of Mr. Lincoln's power over his feelings, I will mention that on arriving at the Executive Mansion on Monday evening, March 2, 1863, to attend the reception then to take place, the President informed me that he had just received the news of the capture of our steam ram Indianola; but, said he, "it is known to no one else here, and as I do not wish it known until the reception is over, please not to mention it." He made some further remarks as to the misfortunes that were befalling us. The visitors commenced arriving, and he stood there shaking hands and conversing in his usual cordial and pleasant manner until the reception was over, when he turned to me and said, "I am glad this reception is over; I have been assuming a cheerfulness that I could not feel, for I could not forget that we have lost the Indianola."

That President Lincoln was beloved by every loyal heart we all know, but I can not refrain from copying from my own description of the dedication of the National Cemetery at Gettysburg the following:

"As soon as the hymn (the consecration hymn) was sung, Marshal Lamon introduced the President of the United States, who, in a few brief but most appropriate words, dedicated the cemetery. Abraham Lincoln is the idol of the American people at this moment. Anyone who saw and heard, as I did, the hurricane of applause that met his every movement at Gettysburg would know that he lived in every heart. It was no cold, faint shadow of a kind reception; it was a tumultuous outpouring of exultation from true and loving hearts at the sight of a man whom everyone knew to be honest and true and sincere in every act of his life and every pulsation of his heart. It was the spontaneous outburst of the heartfelt confidence of the people in their own President."

Perhaps no living man ever had a keener relish for the ludicrous than Mr. Lincoln, and his power of illustration by story and anecdote was beyond that of anyone with whom I was ever acquainted; and such was the tendency of his mind to mirth that I have known him, when a grave question was propounded to him, to reply to it by relating some story perfectly illustrative of the answer required, but of such a nature that no one could resist an audible expression of merriment, in which he was certain most heartily to join, and although the surplus electricity of his nature seemed ever ready to pass off in a manner to make all around him innocently happy, he was ever careful to guard against injury to the feelings of any human being. And I think I can give you the assurance that not one in a hundred of the gross stories that are now imputed to him were ever even heard of by him.

To recall any of the illustrations that I have heard from his lips would be out of place here; but I can not refrain from stating one of his quaint and humorous pieces of advice to me, which you will all appreciate. The basement of the Executive Mansion was at one time so infested with rats as to render it almost uninhabitable. I called the President's attention to the fact, and he said to me, with that inimitable twinkle of the eye and expression of the countenance so remarkable in him, "Can you not procure a ferret, one of those little fellows that drive away the rats? And while you are about it, perhaps it would be well to get several and distribute them about the departments, for there are rats everywhere!" And the good President was so pleased with the idea that he asked me afterwards if I had got those ferrets.

The kindness of his disposition and his readiness to indulge his children may be illustrated by two occurrences that fell under my own observation. The preparations had all been made for the family to leave the city house and establish themselves for the summer at the Soldiers' Home. The carriage was at the door and Mrs. Lincoln and Tad were in it. The President came out to join them, when Tad said, "I have not got my cat." The President replied, "You shall have your cat," and he went into the household and returned in a few minutes with Tad's cat in his arms.

At another time when I was with him in his office conversing on official business one of the servants came in and spoke to him. He at once turned to me and asked me to excuse him for a short time, and he must go and give Tad his medicine, which he would take from no one else.

Such acts as these do honor to human nature, no matter whether done by Presidents or peasants; everyone who has a soul will appreciate them, and I have thought a thousand times, as I have seen the evidences of the minute attention given by the great and good Washington to the smallest matters that concerned his household and his home, while leading the armies of the United States or exercising the high functions of President of the infant Republic, how like in many particulars were these two truly great Presidents.

Although President Lincoln was always ready to assume any official responsibility that his position required, his innate sense of propriety was such that he never knowingly encroached on the prerogatives of his subordinates, no matter what their position might be. A somewhat curious instance of the delicacy of the President in this particular occurred in November, 1864. The day after the certain information of Mr. Lincoln's reelection reached this city it occurred to him that the laborers at the Executive Mansion ought to be granted a holiday. Almost any other man being President of the United States and possessing the power to command would have issued an order giving them a holiday. President Lincoln did no such thing, and what was my surprise at receiving a card from him in his well-known hand and which I now have:

"If Commissioner of Public Buildings chooses to give laborers at White House a holiday, I have no objections.

"A. LINCOLN."

"NOVEMBER 9, 1864."

Of course, the commissioner did choose, and the holiday was given.

The autographs of the beloved President are eagerly sought for and highly valued, and as an evidence of this, I may say that I have seen a simple card, similar to the one above alluded to, on which some request was written by Mr. Lincoln, elegantly framed and suspended in the library of a gentleman in Massachusetts, and considered so precious a memorial that no money can purchase it. And the last manuscript he ever wrote with a pen, on the evening of his assassination, is sacredly preserved, in like manner, in this city by the gentleman for whom it was written. I do not know how I can more appropriately close this, perhaps already too long address, than by reading an article prepared by myself for one of the city newspapers on the 23d of April, 1865. It is as follows:

"On Friday morning last, at 7 o'clock, all that was mortal of Abraham Lincoln, the sixteenth President of these United States, was borne from the Capitol, taking their departure for his home in Illinois, where they are to rest until the final resurrection.

"The past week has been a sad one to the whole Nation. It has been particularly sad for Washington, for here the unparalleled atrocity that deprived a people of a President whom they dearly loved and almost worshipped, and came near snatching from them a Secretary of State, particularly eminent for a head and a heart that gave him an exalted place in the affections of all who knew him, was committed; and as the awful news spread abroad on the wings of the lightning it carried with it sadness to every heart that beat responsive to the great principles of humanity which were so strongly implanted in the bosom of our beloved Chief Magistrate.

"At half-past 10 o'clock on Friday evening, the 14th instant, the bullet of the assassin sped through the brain of his illustrious victim, and from that instant he was as if he were dead, although he continued to breathe until the next morning at 22 minutes past 7.

"That Friday night was an awful one for Washington. The theater where the horrid event occurred was filled with people, and the appalling news spread, as it were, in a moment to all parts of the city. There was no sleep that night. The long roll—that startling call to all military men and to all civilians who understand it—was beat in the various camps within and about the city, and the troops were speedily under arms.

Ah! then and there was hurrying to and fro,
And gathering tears, and tremblings of distress,
And cheeks all pale, which, but an hour ago,
Blushed at the praise of their own loveliness.
* * * * *
And there was mounting in hot haste; the steed,
The mustering squadron, and the clattering car
Went pouring forward with impetuous speed,
And swiftly forming in the ranks of war.

"Many knew not for a time what it all meant, but everyone knew that some terrible calamity was upon us; and ere long the dread reality that our President had been assassinated and our Secretary of State stricken down by the dagger of some fiend in human shape came to be known, and a cordon of troops was soon posted all around the city to prevent, if possible, any egress from it and be prepared for any emergency that an extended conspiracy might render necessary.

"There was a general rush of our citizens to Tenth Street, where in a dwelling opposite the theater lay the dying form of Abraham Lincoln, surrounded by his almost distracted wife, his weeping son, his Cabinet ministers, generals, eminent physicians, and many others whose positions gained them ready admittance to the side of the dying President.

"I stood at his bedside in the early hours of the morning and there witnessed such a scene of solemnity and grief as I never saw before and hope never to see again—

There was silence deep as death,
And the boldest held his breath.

as if it were almost sacrilige to interrupt the solemn stillness about that dying couch.

"The stern Secretary of War sat with his head bowed down in grief; the good and kind Secretary of the Navy stood as if transfixed with sorrow; the ever mild and sunny countenances of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and Attorney General were now overspread with the clouds of distress and mourning; Major General Halleck, who had naturally assumed the direction of affairs, was quietly moving about, fixing his large and most expressive eyes on everything that seemed to require attention and directing in whispering tones of sadness what should be done. The noble form of Sumner, seated near the head of the bed, was bowed low, and tears were flowing from many, many eyes unused to weep.

"Not long after sunrise, I should think—time could not well be counted and the heavens were weeping in a gentle rain—at the request of some of the personal friends of Mrs. Lincoln I went to the President's carriage after Mrs. Secretary Welles, and ere I could return the noble martyr had ceased breathing. I witnessed the bearing of the remains to the presidential mansion, saw them removed from the temporary coffin in which they were borne there, and from that time until they were placed in the car at the railroad depot for transportation to Illinois I was much of the time with them. My official duties made me almost one of the President's household, and on all public occasions I stood at his side or near him, and I felt as if, even had duty not demanded my presence, I could not leave the inanimate form of him of whom I had seen so much and whom I loved so well in life.

"The days of preparation passed by; the lying in state in the East Room, where thousands stood at the side of their beloved and martyred chief and paid to his memory the tribute of respect with streaming eyes; the funeral services, attended by the noble assemblage of all who aided the Executive in the performance of his arduous duties in Washington—hundreds of the most respectable civilians of the country; the full Diplomatic Corps, whose rich dresses were in marked contrast to their sad, sad countenances, for they all loved Abraham Lincoln—the mourners, not only of the family but from his native and his adopted State; the reverend clergy in full numbers. I witnessed it all.

"I listened with a most melancholy but proud satisfaction to the religious services, full of submissive piety, but also full of exalted patriotism. I saw the immense concourse of people, civil and military, who crowded Pennsylvania Avenue from Georgetown to the Capitol, as the funeral cortege passed along, marking by their bowed forms and their sighs and tears their deep grief at the loss of one whom they had looked upon as their father. I saw the sacred remains deposited on the catafalque in the center of the Rotunda of the Capitol, with the semblages of grief all around it, and heard the pious and eloquent divine, who had been from the first at the side of the departed and his mourning family (Doctor Gurley), repeat with great impressiveness, earnestness, and devotion so much of the burial service as was appropriate, ending with a prayer.

"The crowd then departed. The guard of honor, which had been ever present since the sad catastrophe, consisting at least of one major general and his staff, and often of two, were left in charge of the body.

"At 8 o'clock on Thursday morning the coffin was opened and the crowd admitted, and between that time and 10 o'clock in the evening nearly 40,000 persons looked in sorrow and in tears upon that beloved face.

"At 6 o'clock a. m. on Friday there were assembled in the Rotunda all the Cabinet ministers, the committee who were to accompany the remains, Reverend Doctor Gurley, Lieutenant General Grant, and many other high officers of the Army, the police of the Capitol, and a few prominent citizens. Doctor Gurley addressed with deep fervor and great impressiveness the Throne of Grace, and his prayer found a solemn response, I doubt not, in every bosom.

"The coffin was then closed and was borne by 12 sergeants to the hearse, and being escorted by a battalion of the Veteran Reserve Corps was followed by Lieutenant General Grant and Brigadier General Hardee, arm in arm, and many other officers of the Army, the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and captain of the Capitol police, all on foot, and by the President and heads of the departments and the committee in carriages to the Baltimore Depot, where it was placed in a car deeply and most appropriately draped in mourning and prepared for the occasion, where the reverend clergyman again offered up a prayer to the Father of us all; and at 8 o'clock the train moved off, and he whom we all loved so well and for whom we would have willingly given our own lives was borne in solemnity and gloom toward his final resting place in the bosom of the State who gave him to us."

Unveil thy bosom, faithful tomb,
Take this new treasure to thy trust,
And give these sacred relics room
To slumber in the silent dust.

Thus the remains of Abraham Lincoln left us to find a resting place in the capital of his adopted and beloved home. It was one grand, solemn, and imposing funeral procession from Washington to Illinois, and I have been told by a gentleman who accompanied it that no dwelling was passed in all that distance, whether the palace of the rich or the humble cottage of the poor, that did not exhibit some outward badge of the grief that reigned within.

And now, my fellow citizens, we have erected, as I believe, the first public statue to the memory of that President, who more than any other since Washington, lived and ever will live in the hearts of the loyal people. Here, where he won from all who knew him—and who is there who did not know him—golden opinions; here where in the midst of his friends, while enjoying a brief respite from the cares and perplexities, of his exalted but laborious station, he was struck down in death by the hand of a foul and cowardly assassin, have we this day placed upon its pedestal the plain, unassuming, but almost speaking semblance of that plain, unassuming, but noble and god-like specimen of human nature. [Applause.]

We have erected it where the earliest kiss of rosy day, as she approaches from the east, may fall upon it, and where the last gleam of evening's mellow light may salute it as the twilight darkens into night. Here it stands, as it were, in the plaza of the city; and here it will stand, we hope, to be seen by generations long hence to come. [Cries of "It will!"]

Let the fathers of the city, in times of trouble, gather around it and acquire inspiration by calling to mind the firmness, patience, fidelity, zeal, and nobleness of character of him whom it represents. Let the generations of young men gather around it and recall, as their example and their guide, the virtue, sobriety, modesty, and uprightness of life and purpose of that great man. And let us all bear in mind and ever profit by the remembrance how Abraham Lincoln placed all his trust in God, and implored His blessing upon every act of his exemplary life.

* * * God called him
Hence to lay his armor down,
To take his more than conqueror's wreath,
His martyr's glorious crown.

In the great hosts of freedom's sons,
Our Lincoln leads the van,
Himself the greatest, "noblest work
Of God, an honest man."

Arise, then, oh, my country, rise!
Be worthy of his fame,
Lift high the banner of the right,
Put all its foes to shame.

Follow where Lincoln's footsteps led—
His spirit be your own—
'Twill lead you on to victory; 'twill
Lead you to God's throne!

[Immense applause.]

After the address of Major French the band of the Twelfth Infantry performed Rans l'es Vaches.

Col. E. B. Olmstead was then introduced, and recited an original poem, which was received with great applause.

THE UNCOVERING OF THE STATUE.

Professor Heald's band then performed an appropriate air, when Mayor Wallach advanced to the front of the platform with the President and said:

"My friends, it is hardly necessary for me to inform you what is now to take place or who the distinguished person is who will perform this ceremony. The anxiety depicted in your upturned countenances plainly tells that you are awaiting the unveiling of the statue."

The President then pulled the cord, when the covering of the statue fell, and vociferous cheers were given by the crowd.

Mr. Lot Flannery, the artist, was here introduced and loudly cheered.

The Marine Band then performed a prayer by Donizetti, after which Reverend Doctor Gillette pronounced the benediction, and the crowd dispersed.

The Mrs. Ellen Spencer Mussey Tent, No. 1, Daughters of Veterans, went on record indorsing the reerection of the Lincoln statute in a letter June 20, 1921, as follows:

MY DEAR MR. KING: The members of the patriotic organization, Mrs. Ellen Spencer Mussey Tent, No. 1, Daughters of Veterans, whose soldier fathers fought under Lincoln for the honor and unity of their country and inculcated in the hearts of their children a wonderful love and reverence for that great and noble character, Abraham Lincoln, desire to express to you their very sincere appreciation of your action in introducing before Congress a motion to have the statue of Lincoln replaced in its former position in front of the City Hall, and to thank you for your interest in a matter which is very close to the hearts of the Daughters of Veterans.

Please accept congratulations on the success of your efforts, and sincere good wishes for your future welfare.

Cordially yours,

MRS. ELLEN SPENCER MUSSEY TENT NO. 1,
DAUGHTERS OF VETERANS,
By MARJORIE MAYNARD,
Secretary pro tempore.

Lieutenant General Miles, speaking before the Society of the Dames of the Loyal Legion at Washington, D. C., February 12, 1920, said concerning the statue:

Soon after the tragic death of President Lincoln his friends erected a suitable monument and placed it facing the broad avenue where our statesmen and Supreme Court judges pass it every day and in front of the courthouse, where it is seen by thousands of his devoted fellow countrymen. I can not describe to you my feelings a few days ago when I saw men engaged in taking it down. It seemed to me like a sacrilege, and my views are expressed in the following lines:

You may move or destroy the Lincoln statue,
But you ne'er can erase from hearts that are true
That reverence sublime that all patriots cherish
For a life made immortal, that never can perish.

From the humblest of homes to the head of the Nation,
Mid the desperate turmoil of war's desolation,
He led our brave sons in a righteous cause
And welded their faith to freedom's just laws.

Loyal hands had there placed it, on sacred ground,
Near the temple of justice and law profound.
In the distance the Nation's Capitol is seen,
Where patriotism and power are held supreme.

Place it back there again, we earnestly pray,
A Nation's gratitude will amply repay.
Put it back where the friends of the martyr's sad story
Had placed it, and leave it alone in its glory.

Demand that the Lincoln statue, recently taken down from in front of the courthouse, be placed again on—the same consecrated spot where it was erected half a century ago—was contained in a joint resolution introduced in the general assembly of the State of Ohio by State Representative Beaty.

Without qualification the representatives and senators of the eighty-third General Assembly of Ohio unanimously condemn this unpatriotic and unprecedented vandalism and demand that the venerated monument be replaced on the same consecrated spot where it was erected half a century ago—

Said the resolution.

ASKS PRESIDENT WILSON TO HELP.

The resolution further states—

That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and to our two Senators and our Representatives in Congress, with the urgent and respectful request that they use their power and authority of their great offices to repair this wrong and restore the venerated shaft to its former place in its entirety as when dedicated in 1868.

In 1866 and 1867, the resolution states, immediately after the martyrdom of Lincoln—

Steps were taken in the city of Washington to erect a monument to Abraham Lincoln in front of the city hall there, and the movement was made successful by small contributions of the people, who knew personally and loved the mighty Lincoln.

FIRST ONE TO LINCOLN.

Said monument was the first one in memory of Lincoln, modest and plain, like himself, entirely best representing that great man ever yet erected—surmounted as it was by a life-size statue of him, as like as life.

Said monument was dedicated in 1868 in the midst of the largest and most august assemblage of our mightiest Americans, most of whom personally knew Lincoln well, and with them, also, were thousands of Union soldiers who had gone to battle at Lincoln's call.

UNVEILED BY PRESIDENT JOHNSON.

Notably, Andrew Johnson, President, unveiled the statue and made a memorable speech dedicating the monument and consecrating forever the sacred spot on which it has stood half a century.

Vandal hands have dared to desecrate, pull down, wreck, and destroy that monument, and hidden it away from human view, to the shame and disgrace of the whole American Nation.

LETTER FROM AN OLD RESIDENT OF WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 25, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. KING: I was so glad to read the notice in to-day's paper about your effort to have the Lincoln statue reerected. I had been wondering if some one in authority would not take up the removal of that statue when it had stood so long as a monument of love to him who had lost his life in the service of his country.

I knew Lincoln and shook hands with him when he ran for President. I was then living in Ohio. He was one grand, good man, and how well do I remember how our hearts were torn with anguish when the word came that he was shot. Never will I forget it, though so many years have passed since that awful tragedy. I thought of the event every time I passed the statue.

I for one am glad you have brought this matter to the attention of Washington people, and I know that you will receive more letters thanking you for your effort in bringing up the subject of its removal. I hope it will be placed again where it stood so long.

MRS. MARY FLORENCE EDMONSON.

605 TWENTY-SECOND STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C., June 15, 1921.

Hon. EDWARD J. KING,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A stranger to you, with no claim on your attention, I crave indulgence and pardon for writing to you about a matter very near to all hearts that love Lincoln. I am deeply interested in your bill to restore the desecrated memorial to its proper and original site.

The few of us remaining after 1866, 1867, and 1868, who raised the money out of our poverty to pay for the only true Lincoln statue on earth, may be pardoned for asking reparation of the crime of destroying and despoiling it.

I saw the first dollar paid by subscriptions of poor people, mostly soldiers who knew Lincoln well. We were all young then, and poor—the country bankrupt.

It was built out of poverty and love by the mites of the lowly whom Lincoln loved as God does.

I saw it unveiled by President Johnson, 1868, in presence of such a throng of America's greatness as earth never before beheld, and alas! never shall again.

It was a great day.

At 83 I recall the scene vividly to memory but can not describe it. They who could are gone to the silent land.

It was built by us.

It is our monument.

It is a masterpiece, because it is a true, simple resemblance of Lincoln.

May God prosper you in assisting it to its own place. There is but one consecrated place.

PRIVATE DALZELL.

The following is a letter from Mr. Freeman Thorp, an artist who personally knew Lincoln and who painted the portrait of Schuyler Colfax, one of the Speakers of the House, now hanging in the House lobby. He also painted the portrait of Lincoln which was purchased by the Senate and now hangs in the main corridor in the Senate wing of the Capitol. He also painted President Grant and others:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 5, 1921.

Hon. EDWARD J. KING,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In support of your resolution ordering the statue of Lincoln reerected on its original site in the courthouse grounds, permit me to say that having sketched Lincoln from life just before he was inaugurated, and again at Gettysburg, and studied him very carefully and thoroughly under conditions no other man now living has ever had, I made diligent search for the statue, seeking to know whether it is a real likeness of Lincoln. I consider a true likeness in historical statues or portraits of prime importance.

I found the statue lying out of doors and not safely boxed, and readily obtained assurance from the office of Colonel Sherrill that it should at once be made secure from accident or malicious injury.

There are other statues of Lincoln that are great, considered in the sense of modern works of art, yet none yet made so true and characteristic as a likeness of the rugged, strong, unassuming great man whose memory we all love.

As there is no man now living who can make a statue of Lincoln from life or from memory, this one should be preserved with the utmost care, here where the greatness of his life was enacted and where more of the people of this great Nation can easily see it than anywhere else.

With great respect,

FREEMAN THORP,
138 East Capitol Street.

Restoration of the Lincoln statue was urged on December 7, 1921, by a committee representing the Sons of the American Revolution which called on me:

The committee consisted of Admiral George W. Baird, who personally contributed for the erection of the statue; Rev. William Curtis White, representing the first Episcopal parish of the District; Fred Owen, for 44 years connected with the office of public buildings and grounds in Washington; David Lynn and Charles E. Fairman, architects.

GUARANTEE OF EXPENSE.

The committee stated that descendants of the original contributors to the Lincoln statue fund stood ready to meet the expenses for a new pedestal and reerection of the memorial through private subscriptions.

They also urged that Elliott Woods, architect of the Capitol, be appointed chairman of a commission to draw up plans for a new base for the statue and estimate the cost of replacing it. Mr. Woods had charge of remodeling the courthouse, and it was in process of this work that the Lincoln statue was removed.

Mr. Fairman, who is in charge of the art work in the Capitol, speaking against the removal of the old statue, quotes from Proverbs in saying, "Remove not the ancient landmark which our fathers have set." Mr. Fairman said: "Five hundred members of the Sons of the American Revolution living in the District desire the statue reerected as an act of simple justice. It is as important to preserve the art of 1868 as it is to preserve the art of 1921."

VIEWS OF ADMIRAL BAIRD.

Admiral Baird pointed out that the Lincoln statue "belonged to the people of Washington. I and my folks contributed to its erection and have an equity in it to-day. To allow its desecration sets a precedent for the removal of landmarks and statues, rich in sentiment, throughout the entire country. Congress should protect the inherent rights of the Commonwealth in all matters of sentimental value."

Reerection of the Lincoln statue on its original site in front of the courthouse, on a low and artistic base in harmony with the surroundings, was advocated January 17, 1922, by a committee representing the Aztec Club of Washington.

The committee consisted of Rev. William Hayloe Snyder, canon of Washington Cathedral; Col. J. F. Reynolds Landis, and Col. Robert N. Getty.

Elliott Woods, Architect of the Capitol, submitted a new design for the base of the statue, which later will be submitted to the House of Representatives for consideration. The new base suggested would raise the base of the statue approximately 5 feet from the level of the sidewalk.

I recall the statue from earliest childhood—and I viewed its removal with deep regret. I and scores of the older residents of Washington remark on the absence. For sentimental as well as artistic reasons the statue should be reerected at once.

Reverend Snyder said—

The suggested pedestal would remove all criticism in regard to the former high pedestal, which, although artistic compared to art at the time of 1867, would not harmonize with the courthouse to-day.

This statue should be treasured as valuable evidence of art at the time of its erection—

Colonel Landis said.

PRESIDENT FOR REPLACEMENT.

Warren G. Harding, President of the United States, pledged his aid in replacing the statue on April 28, 1921, to a delegation headed by Gen. Nelson A. Miles, and consisting of more than 100 men and women representing patriotic organizations of the United States.

On May 2, 1921, President Harding wrote to Hon. NORMAN J. GOULD, chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives:

I very recently received a call of a very notable delegation representing the Loyal Legion urging the reconsideration at the hands of Congress of the decision to remove the statue erected in memory of President Lincoln in front of the City Hall in 1868.

It is such a fascinating story, and there seems to be so much of appealing sentiment about the restoration of this statue to its original position, that I think Congress might well expedite the reconsideration of the action so that this memorial may be restored to the place it so long occupied.

I cordially believe the sentiment is one that we ought to sanction, and I am glad to express the hope that Congress will take favorable action in providing for the restoration.

Among those who have worked untiringly for the restoration of the statue are Hon. Norman J. Gould; Hon. Ben Johnson; Hon. Robert Luce; Hon. Herbert C. Pell, jr.; Hon Simeon D. Fess; Hon. Frank Park; Hon. Ralph Gilbert; Theodore Noyes; John C. Shanks; Hon. William R. Wood; Hon. Edward H. Wason; and Mrs. Gen. John A. Logan.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11118) to provide for the deportation of certain undesirable aliens, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 11118) to provide for the deportation of certain undesirable aliens was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of members of James G. Blaine Council, No. 1, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Stamford, Conn., praying for the enactment of House Joint Resolution 268, extending the operation of the immigration act of May 19, 1921, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from Philip P. Wells, president Connecticut Forestry Association, of Middletown, Conn., praying for the passage of the Keyes bill, making an appropriation of $2,000,000 for continuance of the purchase of forest lands in the White and Appalachian mountains, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of members of Mattabessett Grange, No. 42, Patrons of Husbandry, of Middletown, Conn., protesting against railroad or coal-mine owners and managers, or their workmen, creating conditions preventing the country's recovery from the scourge of war, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by members of Lady Fowler Council, No. 58, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Milford, Conn., favoring the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

PROPOSED NEW OFFICIALS OF DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (S. 3396) creating the positions of Second Assistant Secretary and private secretary in the Department of Labor, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and suggested that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, which was agreed to.

Reservation to connect with the State highways reaching said reservation from the north, south, east, and west, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10871, the War Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on April 6, 1922, the President had approved and signed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 160) authorizing the extension for a period of not to exceed 25 years of the time for the payment of the principal and interest of the debt incurred by Austria for the purchase of flour from the United States Grain Corporation, and for other purposes.

ENLARGEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS (S. DOC. NO. 178).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney General in response to Senate Resolution 156, relative to steps necessary to be taken to complete the acquisition of lands between the Capitol and Union Station for the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds, as provided in the act approved June 25, 1910, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of the United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the amendment now pending, but I do rise to say that I am opposed to the bill, and I think before I am through I will demonstrate to the Senate that it is not necessary, even though they call it an emergency bill.

I am opposed to this method of legislation. It is history repeating itself. One hundred and twenty years ago, and not since that time has a bill of this nature been introduced in either body of the Congress. Every student of history remembers what scandal and what criticism attended the passage of that bill. It was called by some the "midnight judges bill."

I am opposed to creating a wholesale lot of judges for life at great salaries and taxing the people, as this bill will do, to the extent of a quarter of a million dollars, when it is not necessary. Senators will remember that there was passed, at the time I just referred to, what was then called, as this is called, an emergency bill. A dead party was going out. Mr. Jefferson was coming in. Mr. Adams had signed the commissions and Mr. Jefferson sent his Attorney General, on the night of March 3, with his watch in hand, to look at John Marshall, who was Secretary of State, signing the commissions. The hour of 12 o'clock arrived, and they had been signed. So great was the indignation and criticism of that bill in the country that all succeeding Congresses refused to make the appropriation to pay the salaries of the judges, and they had to go out of office.

I say, Mr. President, let every tub stand on its own bottom. If a judge is needed in any district, let a Senator from that State introduce a bill, have it referred to the committee, and let it be reported back to the Senate, and passed. But do not let us have a wholesale bill like this measure, which proposes to establish all these great offices, giving pie to this one and pie to that one, a bill that is, as I expect to show, a pork-barrel bill, although the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] resents that designation.

The present Presiding Officer, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], early in the session introduced a bill to establish an additional judge in Michigan. Such a judge was needed in that State at that time. The Senate Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill favorably, it passed the Senate and went to the House, but the House declined to pass it. Some 8 or 10 other bills of a similar nature have been introduced in the Senate, passed where they were believed necessary, gone to the House, but the House has refused to pass them. But now the House sends over to us, as I am going to show, this pork-barrel bill providing for some 20 judges in one bill, instead of passing the individual bills which we sent to that body.

Is it a pork-barrel bill? Why, Mr. President, it starts off with a provision for 19 judges, with 19 pieces of pie. As we have two Senators from each State, the bill starts off with 38 votes, and now there are some 16 amendments pending to add as many more judges. If we pass this bill, and the news goes out to the country of what we have done, there will be the same criticism and the same scandal and the same indignation among the people that followed the act which was passed creating 16 new judgeships in the time of Mr. Adams.

I say this method of legislating is wrong, and I am going to show, Mr. President, that there have crept into the bill provisions for judges in districts which, in my judgment, are not entitled to them. The bill provides for two judges for Massachusetts, a State which now has one judge.

I desire to remind Senators that the bill is now brought forward as an emergency bill, on the plea that the great number of cases arising out of prohibition legislation which are now on the dockets of the courts require additional judges in order that they may be tried. Therefore I shall base my argument upon the statistics which are to be found in the table furnished us by the Attorney General, showing the number of criminal cases which are now on the court dockets for the trial of which additional judges are said to be needed. Except for prohibition indictments and prosecutions the bill never would have been introduced, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] will admit.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask my colleague a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to his colleague?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is there a contention from any source that there is not at present a sufficient number of judges to try and dispose of the class of cases which are known as civil cases?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have not heard of such a contention.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is not that also true as to admiralty cases?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is. Indeed, I have not heard that there is any necessity for the creation of these additional judgeships except in connection with the trial of criminal cases. I will say in passing that there may be some 8 or 10 judges needed in this country; but to show that all the additional judges provided for are not needed I am going to quote the testimony of a judge who was a witness before our committee and who was called here by the Attorney General.

Consider the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] providing for an additional judge for New Jersey. He did not introduce a bill to create an additional judgeship there, as I recollect; he did not go before the committee in advocacy of such a measure; and yet, when this "pie" is going around, he wants his piece, as do all the other Senators. That constitutes the viciousness of this proposed legislation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I stated very explicitly on yesterday that the reason why I could not appear before the Committee on the Judiciary to offer my amendment was because of the pressure of other public business; and that I had, therefore, asked the committee that I might have the privilege of introducing the amendment on the floor of the Senate and of showing the Senate the need of the State of New Jersey for another judge, which I tried to do on yesterday.

I desire further to say to the Senator from North Carolina that the appointment of an additional judge for New Jersey is not a question of "political pie," but the amendment has been offered because the State of New Jersey needs an additional judge in order to dispense justice and to enforce the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. I heard the Senator's able and interesting statement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senate is the proper place to offer such an amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senate is the proper place, and if the Senate is going to pass the bill, let us give every State an additional judge.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Did I understand the Senator to say that there are pending 16 amendments providing for the appointment of additional judges?

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand there are 16 such amendments pending.

Mr. NORRIS. Providing for 16 additional judges?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir; that is what I am told.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator has that anything to do with the free coinage of silver?

Mr. OVERMAN. Hardly.

Mr. President, I am not complaining of the Senator from New Jersey particularly; I am only complaining in general against such procedure. The Senator from New Jersey spoke on yesterday and gave his reasons for not going before the Committee on the Judiciary and offering his amendment there. I appreciate the circumstances, but I must say that he never introduced a bill in the Senate for the appointment of an additional judge for New Jersey, as did the Senator from Michigan, as did the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and as other Senators have done, whose bills have been considered by that committee and reported if the committee favored the measures; but the Senator waits to make his proposal until this omnibus bill comes before the Senate.

I do not know whether the Senator ever thought of having another judge for New Jersey until this "pie bill" came over here from the other House. I am not charging the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] with any logrolling. He stands too high as a man, he is too great and too good a man, and is too much of a statesman for anything of that kind; nobody would make such a charge in connection with him. However, this bill is here; it comes over from the House of Representatives. Instead of passing the 10 independent bills providing for additional judges which we have sent to that body, they return to us a "pork barrel" bill. Now, it is proposed by amendments on the floor to add other judges to the bill. As I have said, I hardly suppose the Senator from New Jersey would ever have thought about another judge for New Jersey—for they have three in that district now—except, believing that this bill is going to pass, he thought why should not New Jersey also have another judge. I do not blame him. I do not blame any other Senator under the circumstances for trying to secure another judicial office in his State, an extra piece of "pie," if you please.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to make one correction in his statement?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senate has passed only six bills for the creation of additional judgeships.

Mr. OVERMAN. I stated the number as being eight. Perhaps it was only six.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator stated that 10 such bills had passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, say six.

Mr. NELSON. I think only six such bills have passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senate passed two years ago six or eight bills providing for the creation of additional judgeships. Those bills have slept the sleep of death in the House of Representatives. Why? Nobody said that the bills were not proper or that they were unnecessary or that the judges were not needed. Why were they not passed? It was because if the House of Representatives had passed those bills, and they had been approved by the President, as a result of such action 10 Democratic judges would have been appointed. Now, however, the House sends us here an omnibus bill providing for the appointment of 22 judges, and, should the bill become a law, as everyone knows, Republicans will be appointed to the judgeships. This proposed legislation would require the appropriation of a quarter of a million dollars to be a further burden upon the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OVERMAN. I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I wish to protest against some of the statements which have just been made by the Senator from North Carolina.

My observation is that when an individual bill is introduced for the purpose of providing an additional judge for a particular district it is regarded as purely a local affair, and the Senate passes every bill of that kind which is introduced and which receives the approval of the Judiciary Committee.

The pending bill commands the general attention of the Senate and of the country, and we are now investigating carefully, I hope as carefully as we can, the needs of the several judicial districts. My judgment is that a much more careful and painstaking investigation is being made now with regard to the needs of the several districts than has ever been made before. From that viewpoint I think the Senator from North Carolina must concede that this is not a logrolling affair.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say there that I will not admit that the great Judiciary Committee does not consider carefully every bill that comes to it for consideration and recommendation to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not said that it did not; I have said that every bill which passes the scrutiny of the Judiciary Committee comes into the Senate, and the Senate regards it as a local affair and passes it just as it would a bridge bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the way it is proposed to pass the pending measure, because Senators want the amendments which they have proposed to it acted upon favorably, so that their States may be taken care of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, of course I do not know about all the bills which are referred to the Judiciary Committee, but I wish to take issue with the Senator from Iowa in regard at least to one situation. I know that for something like seven or eight years we were begging for an additional judge in the State of Mississippi, where court is held at three different places, at each of which there are separate officials. We wanted a new judge, but we never could secure the enactment of the bill providing for the additional judge while there was a Democratic President to make the appointment. Now, I do not know that the Judiciary Committee was actuated by any partisan motive, but the fact remains that what I have stated is true, and the fact also remains that the evidence was abundant that the State of Mississippi had less judicial service in comparison with its business and its population than almost any other State in these United States. Now we are informed that perhaps we may be given an additional judge since there is a Republican President in office.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has not been informed to that effect by me, nor has he been so informed, I think, by any member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say the Senator informed me to that effect.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the State of Mississippi really needs an additional judge, and I am not in favor of another judge for the State of Mississippi.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I decline to yield further. I think the Senator from Iowa is of the opinion that there are additional judges provided for several districts in the pending bill which ought not to be provided for, and I think every Senator will come to that opinion when he reads the bill carefully and informs himself as to what the statistics show.

There can be no question, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives refused to pass the bills proposing to create new judgeships which had been acted upon favorably by the Senate because, even though they were necessary, they would have involved the appointment of Democratic judges. Now, however, although we could not secure the appointment of Democratic judges who were needed, we have before us a bill proposing to provide 22 additional Republican judges. Is such a bill as that a logrolling measure? Is it a pork-barrel bill? It is a pork-barrel judges bill. I am sorry that after 120 years a pork-barrel judges bill comes before us. In my opinion it is scandalous.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. There has been one other bill like it, which was passed immediately upon Adams going out of the Presidency and Jefferson coming in.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the instance I had in mind when I said that for 120 years there had been no such bill pending before Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That bill was finally defeated by Congress refusing to appropriate for the salaries of the perambulatory judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. In that instance there was so much criticism by all parties, and so much scandal attached to that measure, that, although the judges under the bill were appointed for life, no Congress under that emergency measure ever appropriated a cent for their salaries, and they lived and died as judges appointed to office without Congress having made an appropriation to pay their salaries.

When the object and terms of this bill are understood and it is realized that the people will be taxed $250,000 to provide 22 or more great judicial offices for life, despite the pledges which have been made that offices would be abolished and economies so far as possible would be instituted, I believe the country will be indignant over this bill. As I have said, it is not the way, Mr. President, to act upon this important question.

I am in favor of providing additional judges where they are needed. I voted for the bill of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]; I voted for the bill of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]; I voted for the bill of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], each of which bills provided additional judges, because I believed those judges were needed. I also have voted for other bills of similar character, but I am opposed to a wholesale bill such as the one now before us.

One of the witnesses before the committee was asked to come here by the Attorney General to appear before the committee. He is a great judge, and stated in his testimony that he had been assigned to practically every circuit in the United States, the business in his district in Alabama not being sufficient to occupy all of his time. I refer to Judge Grubb, a good man, appointed by President Taft, one of the best judges on the bench. He has been all over the country, and has held court in almost every district in the Union. Mr. President, I will read from his testimony. He was brought here as a witness, with Judge Sater, who also is a great, good judge. As I knew Judge Grubb I took the liberty to cross-examine him a little.

Mr. SHIELDS. He was one of the Attorney General's commission.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; the Attorney General commissioned him to look into this whole matter, and he came here and appeared before our committee. I concluded I would ask him some questions. Let us see what he said; let us get at the truth of this matter, as to whether or not the additional judges provided for are needed.

Senator OVERMAN. How many districts do you find are congested in the whole country?

Judge GRUBB. I can give the cities. There are Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Chicago, St. Louis, Atlanta—the Atlanta district—California, the San Francisco district, and Detroit. I think those are the principal points of congestion.

There are about eight of them; and it is shown by the statistics, Mr. President, that a great number of the cases are draft cases, and all of the witnesses testified that none of them ever would be tried. They never will be tried. The bankruptcy cases are always referred to a referee, and then there are all these whisky cases. It was testified that half of them—one great district attorney said two-thirds of them—were submissions of "guilty." There is no trial at all. He said "There were 700 cases on my docket, and two-thirds of them came in and submitted to a verdict of guilty." You generally catch a man redhanded with liquor in these cases, and yet that is the reason why they say that this emergency bill ought to pass. It proves nothing as to congestion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question at this time?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I am always glad to yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did the distinguished judge to whom the Senator from North Carolina is now referring join in the report recommending the appointment of 18 additional judges?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, Mr. President; I will come to that directly. He recommended that these other judges—18 roving, carpetbag judges, as they are sometimes called—and the Chief Justice should have a meeting here in Washington, like the head of an army, a chief of staff, and have the circuit judges here constitute the general staff to assign these judges, to send a man from Maine to California, or from North Carolina to Wisconsin, to hold court. What does he know about the law in Wisconsin? What does he know about your people? What does he know about the conditions existing there? It is wrong in principle, and the Judiciary Committee turned it down. We would not pass any such bill as that, although these judges, who came here and recommended it, are good men, able men, but impractical. We would not stand for that bill at all, and I do not think any man in the Senate would stand for such a bill as that—to have 18 roving judges to be sent around at the will of the Chief Justice and his staff here in Washington, coming here once a year to send them around all over the country. It is fundamentally wrong.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the bill that is now pending provide not for these judges but for judges to meet in Washington every year?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, Mr. President, all that was left out of the wreck of that bill was section 2; and I am going to make some remarks about that, and why it ought not to pass. They dismantled the whole bill that asked for those roaming judges, but they left in section 2, in which it is provided that the judges shall come here in September, get $10 a day extra pay and their expenses, sit around a table with the Chief Justice presiding, and decide that this judge shall go here and that judge shall go there and that judge yonder. It is all wrong, Mr. President; and if this bill passes, what is the use of it? We are providing, they say, for additional judges at places where they are needed. If they are not needed, why call all the circuit judges of the United States here to Washington and let them sit up here in the Willard Hotel or around a table getting $10 a day extra and their expenses for the Chief Justice, the chief of staff, to find out where they should go, and assign them? I say it is fundamentally wrong. We ought not to mix up this matter with a kind of a military affair under which one man shall send a judge here or there. Chief Justice Taft says in his testimony that they want to have supervision over them and watch them. Watch a circuit judge? Watch a district judge? Why, they ought to be independent of Congress, independent of the Chief Justice, independent of everybody. They do not need any watchers. They are honorable men.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to say that the Chief Justice meant, by watching them, to watch them during the year, or did he not have reference to watching them while they were in Washington? That would be more reasonable, because these judges come from the country and are unacquainted with the city here, and they will be invited to dinners and parties, and so on, and probably will need watching while they are here.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will read what he says if I can find it; but, Mr. President, this bill ought not to pass. I tell you, Senators, whenever you do pass a bill appropriating all of this money and creating this wholesale number of great offices, you are going to hear from it in the country. The people will not stand for it. I am getting letters of criticism now which I am going to read to you—one from a very great man, one of the greatest men in this country—on this subject, criticizing this bill. He has read the RECORD, he says, and his attention has been called to it, and he is opposed to it. I will find out directly what Chief Justice Taft says.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does not this bill carry two additional judges for North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, sir. North Carolina, as the Senator will admit, is entitled to an additional judge if any district in this country is; but I did not ask it, and they do not ask it. The judges there are doing business, and I am going to show you that the judges there have more business every year than half the districts provided for in this bill have on their dockets. They will all admit that North Carolina is entitled to a new judge if any other district is.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest that the Senator did not fully answer the question of the Senator from Washington? This bill provides for an additional circuit judge in the fourth circuit, and in that circuit is the State of North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to explain about that. I do not care anything about it. I said this to the committee: "If this bill is to pass, here is a bill which has passed the Senate four times. Every district or circuit in the United States has from two to five judges, except the fourth. We have only two. One of them is sixty-odd years old, and so is the other. If the thing is going around, a piece of pie, I am not asking it, and you gentlemen ought not to do it; I am against the bill; but this bill providing for an extra judge in the fourth circuit has passed the Senate half a dozen times, and it ought to be provided for."

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that. I believe it is the wise thing to authorize the appointment of another circuit judge in the fourth circuit; but the Senator from North Carolina is mistaken in saying he has only two. The fourth circuit has three judges, one of whom was formerly a judge of the Commerce Court, and was assigned to the fourth circuit when that court was abolished.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true; but what I said was true, also. They have only two judges. Judge Knapp is assigned there because he was left up in the air when they abolished the Commerce Court. He is over 70 years old.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from North Carolina is, I believe, a member of the committee which considered this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOSES. Can the Senator tell me on what basis the bill was framed in the form in which it emerged from the Committee on the Judiciary to the Senate? I listened with much interest to what the Senator had to say this morning——

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not going into the secrets of the committee, but I will say that we had a good deal of difficulty with it. We had the bill sent to us for the roaming judges. It was referred to a subcommittee, and we turned that down, and then we had another subcommittee and this bill was reported, and they considered that and a majority of the committee recommended this bill.

Mr. MOSES. No; but what I mean is, on what basis was the allocation of judges made?

Mr. OVERMAN. It was made upon the basis of these statistics which I am going to read.

Mr. MOSES. Last night the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] was calling attention to the situation which exists in his State—a State with a population of several million. The Senator from New Jersey will correct me if I overstate the figures. What is the population of his State?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Three million two hundred thousand; it will be 4,000,000 before long.

Mr. MOSES. And New Jersey had no additional judge provided by this bill. The State of Arizona, however, with a population of—will the Senator from Arizona give me the figures?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Three hundred and thirty-three thousand.

Mr. OVERMAN. That bill came from the House. I will tell the reason why the committee let it stay in the bill—because of the long distances the judge had to travel.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator does not mean to say that the courts in Arizona are held on a railroad train?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the State of Arizona has 113,956 square miles or more area than Connecticut, Massachusetts, Vermont, Maine, New Hampshire, and New York.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not going to yield to anybody. I think the Senator is able to take care of himself when the time comes, and he will answer the question. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is amply able to take care of himself and his matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. As to New Jersey, they have three judges there, I believe the Senator said, and they want more. They never thought of a fourth judge until this bill came up, I suppose because no bill was introduced, and I know that the Senator from New Jersey is one of the most diligent Senators here, and if they had needed a judge he certainly would have introduced a bill asking for it, and it would have been referred to our committee, so as to get it properly before us; but when this bill comes here we find not only him but a dozen other Senators coming in and introducing bills who never thought about a new judge until this bill came up, and then they said: "While the pie is going, give me a piece."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina wishes to be unjust to me and my sincerity.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all. I would not for the world.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I want to say that I have been constantly urged for the last three years to introduce a bill for an additional judge for New Jersey, and my attention has been called to the crowded condition of the courts. Possibly I have been derelict in not doing so.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; the Senator is never derelict in his duty to his constituents.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But it has been a matter of public concern; and I do not think the Senator is quite just when he says that I never thought of it until this bill was introduced.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that the Senator from New Jersey is one of the most diligent and earnest Senators upon the floor, and if he had thought it was necessary to have another judge in New Jersey he would have introduced a bill. If he did not do it when he thought it was necessary, he has been very remiss in his duty, and so have other Senators.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think my good friend from North Carolina is a little too comprehensive in his criticisms. This bill does provide for an additional judge for the northern district of Ohio; and notwithstanding—and I say it with all due respect—the Senator has quoted from Judge Grubb, who named certain districts where there were overcrowded dockets, and no reference is made to the northern district of Ohio, there is one needed there, and let me suggest this:

I did not introduce a bill for an additional judge, not because it was not needed but because this bill, which had been introduced, was to take care of the situation, as it was believed. In Ohio during the last 10 years our population has increased between 20 and 25 per cent. According to the census of 1910, we had 4,700,000 people. By the census of 1920, we had 5,700,000 people; and I know the character of those judges. Two of them are Democrats and two of them are Republicans; and you do not find any Democratic lawyer finding fault with the Republican judges, and you find no Republican lawyer finding fault with the Democratic judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. I reckon we got the Democratic judges by reason of death. We did not get them in any other way.

Mr. POMERENE. No; one of them came by reason of death, and the other one came by reason of a resignation in the State. That is all true; but I would congratulate any of the other States if they had United States district judges of the type and character of those we have in Ohio.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, Senators know the history of this country, and know that it never has been attempted in a hundred years to pass an omnibus bill for this purpose; and I think the Senator from Ohio would have introduced a bill if it had been absolutely necessary and his people had wanted it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if this bill had not been pending I certainly would have introduced a bill; and I say that I not only would have been derelict in my duty if I had not done so, but the Senate of the United States will be derelict in its duty to the people of Ohio if it does not grant this additional judge for Ohio.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that may be so. I am not taking issue with the Senator, except I say that if he had introduced a bill and sent it to the committee and it was necessary the committee would have reported favorably on it, and it would have been passed. What I am complaining of is that "every tub ought to stand on its own bottom"; that every Senator who needs a judge in his State ought to introduce a bill for the purpose, and bring it to the attention of the committee, and let the committee consider it, and have it reported to the Senate. That is the way we have been doing for a hundred years, ever since we had the scandal in this country on account of the judges bill. Why start another scandal now?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. In reference to proposals to increase the number of judges in the various districts, with which the Senator finds fault, perhaps he will allow me to say in regard to Florida that I endeavored yesterday, and propose to continue to endeavor, to put in the bill in the Senate just what it had when it came to the Senate from the House. The House of Representatives put the southern district of Florida in the bill, and they did it after having on two different occasions, in 1917 and 1919, unanimously reported a bill providing for an additional judge in the southern district of Florida. Those bills went on the calendar, and were never considered. They were never reached.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have just said that the Senator from Florida was very diligent, and he introduced his bill, and his bill was considered. His bill was recommended and the Senate considered it and passed it, and the Senator from New York and the Senator from Michigan and my friend, the chairman of the committee [Mr. NELSON], did the same thing. That is the way it is done. That is the way it should be done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the House put in the bill the provision for an additional judge for the southern district of Florida, and now the committee proposes to strike it out.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have stricken it out; we refused to grant the Senator's amendment. The House provided for a lot of other judges, in addition to the ones the Senate had provided for, and that is the pork-barrel feature I am talking about, because it means so many votes. Of course, this bill will pass, with all these Senators provided for. There are two Senators from each State, and the Senators from the States which are provided for will vote for the bill and pass it, and that is the feature that makes this a pork-barrel bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to correct a discrepancy or a difference which seems to exist between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from North Carolina. There are only two district judges in the fourth circuit, the circuit in which the Senator lives, and all the other circuits have from three to five district judges. In reference to the bills we have passed, we passed six independent bills providing additional judgeships in six different States. One of the bills, the New York bill, was amended so as to increase the number from one to two judges for the southern district of New York. We have passed six bills, providing for seven additional judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is so, Mr. President, and, of course, I stand corrected. Whatever the Senator says goes with me. I thought there were eight. There were 10 before, two years ago, which we reported out and passed the Senate—independent bills.

I started to read from the testimony, but I was diverted. I was about to read what Chief Justice Taft said. He stated:

> This bill introduces a reasonable system of watching and supervising conditions by the judges of the courts of appeals, with a view to having them get at the actual facts as to where the arrears are. You gentlemen are all familiar with the fact that dockets are quite misleading.

I may have misquoted the great Chief Justice, but this is what he said, reading from his testimony.

Statistics are misleading, Mr. President, as I am going to show. They are very misleading, and there are a lot of statistics, as a judge writes me, which the Senate should not go into, because they do not amount to anything. The dockets are crowded with old cases which have been hanging on, where the defendants are gone, which are just continued from time to time. Let us get down to some of the statistics.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator has not yet read what Judge Grubb said.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will read what Judge Grubb said in response to this question by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]:

> That is largely accountable for this congestion.

The judge went on to show why.

> Judge GRUBB. If you take away the white-slave law and the narcotics law and the prohibition law, there would be no congestion except in the big cities and recently developed districts.
>
> Judge GRUBB. I think our conclusion, that judges at large be the method of relieving the present congestion, is most subject to criticism from the idea that judges at large are not permanently a good thing, and I agree with that proposition. I think, however, that considering the present congestion, our recommendation is the better view.
>
> Senator OVERMAN. You say there is not much congestion except in these cities you have named?
>
> Judge GRUBB. I think so; yes, sir.

He goes on to say, Mr. President, without reading it, that he has been in every district in the United States, had been assigned to the different districts time and again. He stated:

> In Atlanta there is congestion. Texas, I believe, claims to be congested; but there are five judges in Texas.

This bill provides for an extra judge in Texas, and the committee granted that, I suppose, because one of the judges is sick, according to what they say. We have a general law, passed a few years ago, providing that when any judge is incompetent to try the cases on the docket, has a disability, is unable by reason of the condition of his mind or his enfeebled physical condition to perform his duties, the President is authorized by the general law to appoint another judge. So that an additional judge in Texas is not needed. I continue reading:

> Senator SHIELDS. Do you maintain that the congestion in Atlanta grows to any extent out of the liquor cases?
> Judge GRUBB. Entirely out of prohibition. I have been there three or four times a year to assist them, and I asked the Attorney General whether I had been of any benefit to them, and he said he was sorry, but that I had not relieved the condition at all; that more prohibition cases had come in while I was sitting there than I had disposed of—I think between 3,000 and 4,000.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And that was a bone-dry State before the constitutional amendment was passed.

Judge GRUBB. I am quite sure that five judges ought to be enough in Texas.

We are giving them six.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Have you any tabulation or statistics which you want to file with us?

Judge GRUBB. Yes, sir. Mr. Strong has the statistics. I think the gist of the matter is that there are 142,000 pending cases of all kinds and only 102 district judges to try them, which would make over 1,400 cases per judge.

Senator SHIELDS. What States have you been in?

Judge GRUBB. All the circuits except the fifth circuit.

Senator SHIELDS. And New York?

Judge GRUBB. And New York.

Senator STERLING. These cities of which you speak where the business is congested are in the several circuits, are they not—the nine circuits?

Judge GRUBB. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. That is, there is one large city where there is congestion in each of the circuits?

Judge GRUBB. There are two in some, as Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. I think Brooklyn is congested also.

We have taken care of that situation. This is the statement of Judge Grubb, who has visited every district in the United States except the fifth. He says there is no congestion except in 9 or 10 places in this country, which he named. What are we to do about it? That is the testimony of their own witness, of the ablest judge who appeared before us.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that the Senator's statement that this is a pork-barrel proposition is correct, how could he expect the bill not to include enough places in it so as to secure sufficient votes to pass it? I am not saying it is a pork barrel bill, by any means, but I am assuming the Senator's statement is correct. If that be correct, why does the Senator criticize the inclusion of an extra judge for Texas, for instance? Are there not two senatorial votes from Texas?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not trying to pass the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Are they not compelled to put them in if this is a pork barrel bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the Senators from Texas will not vote for it.

Mr. NORRIS. If we are practical men and want to pass a pork-barrel bill, we must put enough pork in it to get the votes to put it through, must we not?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what pork barrel means. I hope to make such a showing that I can get even those Senators whose States are granted additional judges to vote against the bill. That is the pork-barrel feature. Let us provide for about 10 additional judges. That is all that is needed, as Judge Grubb says. Where there is congestion, it is easily seen, and we should provide extra judges in congested districts; but I do not believe in doing it by this sort of a bill, because it has not been done for a hundred years, and I do not believe in beginning now with such a bill as this. It tends to produce scandal. People will not understand our jumping in and creating a lot of judgeships at one time in a wholesale way. Let every case stand on its own bottom.

Mr. President, I want to read a letter from the clerk of the district court of North Carolina. I did not ask him to write to me. The Attorney General has been thinking about cutting his force, and this clerk gives me some most remarkable statistics. The committee has granted Massachusetts two more judges. How many criminal cases, including prohibition cases, are pending in Massachusetts? He says there are 244. There is only one place in the State where they are holding court; there are only 244 cases on the docket; and the committee has recommended that they be granted two more judges. One judge can try four times as many cases in a year as that number pending, as I will show.

Judge Connor, of the eastern United States district in North Carolina, one of the greatest judges of this country, disposed of 700 cases last year, 1921. Yet up in Massachusetts they want three judges to try 244 cases. One judge in North Carolina disposed of 700 cases, and they want three judges in Massachusetts to dispose of 244 cases.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am interested in the statement made by the eminent Senator from North Carolina in regard to the character of the cases, and the number seems so large that it rather amazes me.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is amazing. I have devoted my argument to the prohibition cases, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] started in with those, and as this whole argument is based upon them. The emergency arises because of the prohibition cases, and I am taking all criminal cases, including prohibition cases, and devoting my remarks to that class.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from North Carolina must have misunderstood me. There will be a certain number of cases to be disposed of. It does not make any difference what kind of cases they are. If there be a large number of prohibition cases, they must be disposed of. If there be a large number of criminal cases of other kinds, they must be disposed of. If there be a large number of civil cases, they must be disposed of. What I said in regard to prohibition cases was that the existence of the prohibition law has greatly multiplied the criminal business of the Federal courts. No one can question that, and if we intend to enforce the prohibition law, those who are accused of crime in violating that statute must be speedily tried, or the enforcement of the law will fail.

I beg to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the situation in Massachusetts.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am going to read that, if the Senator please.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has already read a part of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am going to read it all, because the Senator from Oregon has asked me a question, and I want to be fair with him. I would rather read it myself than to have the Senator from Iowa read it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be very glad to have the Senator read it; but I have said all the while, and said everywhere, that I thought one additional judge sufficient in Massachusetts.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has said that, and I know it; but here we have a provision for two.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why does the Senator not make a motion to strike it out?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am fighting the whole bill. I will let some one else move to strike it out.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Iowa support such a motion? I shall make the motion.

Mr. SHIELDS. I shall make a motion to strike both of the Massachusetts judgeships from the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. In answer to the Senator from Oregon, who has asked me a fair question, I started out to say that my argument against this bill is based upon the criminal cases, including prohibition cases, because I understood that the reasons given before our committee for the passage of this bill was the number of arrests and indictments under the Volstead Act—prohibition cases. In regard to Massachusetts, I have given not only the prohibition cases but all the criminal cases, and they have only 206, which one judge can dispose of in one court in 30 days. Let us see what other cases they have.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, what reason was urged for giving Massachusetts two, with such a small docket in arrears?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to go into that question.

Mr. KING. Then it is obvious, if there is no good reason, that the committee must have made a most egregious blunder. Of course, they would not do anything improper.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not want to criticize the committee, because I think the committee did what they believed was their duty. They are all honorable men, good men, fair men; but I did not agree with them. They are entitled to their opinion, and I am entitled to mine.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator has compared the number of cases tried by three judges in Boston with one judge in North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. One judge in North Carolina.

Mr. NORRIS. He has compared the number of cases one judge tried in North Carolina with the number tried by three judges in Boston.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. A judge in North Carolina tried 700 in one year.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that the Senator refers to State cases and a State judge.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I am talking about Judge Connor, of the eastern district of North Carolina.

Mr. NORRIS. I assumed the Senator referred to a district judge of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; he is a district judge of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. I understood the Senator to refer to a State judge.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I referred to Judge Connor, whom Mr. Taft appointed. He is a Democrat, and there was a good deal of criticism because Mr. Taft appointed him. But, one of the ablest and best judges in the United States, it is a pity that there are not more like him.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator wants to be absolutely fair, and I would like to know whether the Senator expects a man in Boston to try as many cases in a year as a man in North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is pretty cold up there. They have one place of holding court.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from North Carolina know that a judge in Massachusetts did not try as many cases as the judge in North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. He did not try as many.

Mr. CUMMINS. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know what he tried. I am showing that his docket has 200 cases on it, and they want to give them two more judges to try 204 cases. The judge in the eastern district of North Carolina has six places for holding court. He goes all over the State and holds court, and cleans up his docket. That is the reason he got rid of 700 cases. The judge in Boston sits in that great, magnificent courthouse and does not go anywhere else; but they want to give him two more judges to help him try 204 cases.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To hold up the pillars of the temple of justice.

Mr. OVERMAN. Massachusetts has 142 admiralty cases, all other civil cases, 923; bankruptcy cases, 1,434; and draft cases, 3,943. There is no use for me to read about the draft cases. All the witnesses, the Attorney General, and everybody else, said the draft cases would not be tried. They can not get the witnesses. They ought to nol-pros them all and get them off the docket, and then we could get at the real facts and know what we are talking about.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] showed that they only tried in the circuit court 52 cases in the whole circuit, including Massachusetts. Those circuit judges certainly are not doing anything. Instead of giving them three district judges, let one of the circuit judges be assigned to Massachusetts to really try the cases. They have a right to do that.

The northern district of New York is congested and we have given them two judges. They have two already. In the eastern district of New York I do not think they need it, but we have given them one additional. The southern district of New York has four judges, and we have given them one additional. I am not criticizing the condition in New York, although the district attorney was here and said that of the 2,800 cases in the southern district at least 25 per cent of them are submissions. He said also he did not expect to try the draft cases. He said other cases were white-slave cases and narcotic cases, and they do not usually try them. Most of those petty offenders come into court and submit, and it does not take any time at all to dispose of that class of cases.

In the eastern district of Pennsylvania are 283 cases. Judge Connor tried 700 cases. They want another judge in the eastern district of Pennsylvania. They already have two judges to try 283 cases, but they want us to give them another judge, and the committee has given them another judge, making three judges to try 283 cases.

The western district of Pennsylvania has 137 cases. They have two judges to try 137 cases. Judge Connor tried 700 cases in a year, but they want two judges. With only 137 criminal cases on the docket, they want another judge. What for?

The Senator rather criticized me for what I said the other day about some of these judges. Some judges work harder than others. Judge Connor has tried these 700 cases and is doing his duty. He is serving his country faithfully. He believed when he accepted the office that he had a duty to perform in the trial of cases and that he should dispose of the business that came before his court. But there are many of these judges, not criticizing any individual by name, who just go into court and sit a few hours, and that is the end of it. They adjourn over Saturday and have three months vacation in the summer. When you and I and everybody else are working they are up at the summer resorts. I do not desire to make a criticism of the judges as a whole, but that is the condition in many cases.

I have already alluded to Texas. They have six judges in Texas and they want another one. Of course a judge may be feeble in one of the districts and may be crippled in health, in body or mind. If that is so, let the President meet this situation as the law permits him to do and appoint an additional judge.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator is speaking of the northern district of Texas. The Senator knows the committee was informed that one of the judges in the northern district of Texas has been disabled for a long time on account of sickness. We did not add a judge to the northern district of Texas, because there is not sufficient work there to demand more than two judges, but what will we do with an instance in which a judge becomes disabled? We have added, I was about to say, four or five judges in the last few years, either to the circuit court of appeals or to the district bench, solely because judges have become disabled.

Mr. OVERMAN. And such legislation is unnecessary as the Senator knows, and in order to get rid of such legislation as this we passed a general law.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have this option. We can pass a bill allowing a disabled judge to retire upon full compensation if he desires to retire, or we can add an additional judge to his district or to his circuit. So far as the effect upon the Treasury is concerned, it makes not a bit of difference which we do. We might just as well add another judge to the northern district of Texas as to enact a law which would enable the existing judge to retire upon full pay.

Mr. OVERMAN. My point is that it is not necessary to pass a bill, because we can take care of the situation under existing law. I found a judge in the western district of North Carolina, sick and old, and who would not retire, and all the President had to do was to appoint some man to aid him as an additional judge. We have a general law providing for that. What is the use of incorporating such a provision in this bill? What is the use of this legislation when we have a general law allowing the President in a case like that to find the facts? We do not know the facts, but the President gets the Attorney General to find the facts, and as soon as they are presented he appoints a judge. That is what I did in a case like that, and that is what Texas or another State can do.

Now I come to Missouri. The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] never thought about an extra judge in his district of Missouri, and never introduced a bill providing for an extra judge. He is a member of the committee. I believe he did say he wanted one, but he would like to have him transferred from another district to his district instead of his colleague's district, and when his colleague was provided for he came here and introduced an amendment to give him a judge in his district. What is that but pie? He got his piece of pie here yesterday afternoon in the form of an amendment. His colleague came before the committee and the committee gave him an extra judge in Missouri instead of giving it to Senator REED, although Senator REED was a member of the committee, and after the bill is on the floor then Senator REED comes here and asks for another judge and gets that other judge.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator say the committee gave that judge because the Senator happened to be a member of the committee?

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no. I said we did not give it to him, although he was a member of the committee, but he came into the Senate yesterday afternoon and got the additional judge, although he is not entitled to one.

Mr. CUMMINS. How did the Senator from North Carolina vote on that amendment? The Senator voted for the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]?

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not. I would have voted against it if I had had an opportunity to vote. They did not call the roll.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator was in the Chamber?

Mr. OVERMAN. I was.

Mr. CUMMINS. How did the Senator vote?

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not vote for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did the Senator vote against it?

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not. I did not vote at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. There were some of us who voted against it.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senate agreed to the amendment, and the Senator from Missouri was not entitled to the additional judge, and the Senator from Iowa admits that because he voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. That is the way the thing goes. It is a piece of pie and the chairman of the committee was opposed to it, and yet the Senate gave the Senator from Missouri a piece of pie because the Senator from Missouri asked for it. Why not give it to the other 16? The truth of it is, if we are going to do this sort of business, let us give every State another judge; let us burden the taxpayers with a million dollars instead of a quarter of a million dollars; let us wholesale this thing through, and then see what the people will have to say about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask my colleague a question? My colleague has stated there is a general law upon the statute books authorizing the appointment of an emergency judge in case one of the judges of a district or State or circuit may be disabled by reason of his physical or mental condition. That judge, as I understand, is an emergency judge. If one of the judges of that district, especially the one appointed to assist because of the other's disability, should die, the district would not then be entitled to another judge, would it?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. There may be three judges in that district to-day, but one appointed as an emergency judge, and those three can be reduced to two and will be reduced to two upon the death of the disabled judge?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the general law, and a very wise provision, too.

Mr. SIMMONS. Under the pending bill, if we add another judge to that district, those three judges are there permanently?

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That district would always hereafter be entitled to three judges instead of two judges?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is wrong about that. The pending bill provides that all the judges who are appointed under its provisions shall have no successors unless Congress otherwise orders.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then it is not a bill permanently increasing the number of judges that a district or circuit is entitled to?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is only in its nature an emergency measure, and upon the death of the present appointee there will be no successor appointed?

Mr. CUMMINS. There will be no successor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the point I have made is of no value, if that is true.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was discussing the western district of Missouri. Why was that district granted an additional judge? There are 170 cases pending there, and Judge Connor tried 700 cases.

Mr. CUMMINS. To what district is the Senator now referring?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am still talking about the western district of Missouri. Civil cases, 48; criminal cases, 170. Just think of that, Senators—civil cases, 48; criminal cases, 170—but Judge Connor tries 700. All other cases, 316; total, 600; bankruptcy cases, 300; prohibition cases, 188. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the fact that in reading down the column the number of prohibition cases, those cases are included in "all criminal cases," showing that the western district of Missouri only has 170 cases. Another judge is granted to that district, and they already have one, so there will be two judges there to try 170 cases.

Mr. CUMMINS. I observe that most of the votes to provide that district with an extra judge came from the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not believe there were five Democrats in the Chamber at the time. I was in the cloakroom at the time. The votes were all on the Republican side of the Chamber.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, we all voted against it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Iowa and his fellow Republican Senators voted against it, of course. Really, that amendment was accepted. Nobody called a quorum to pass on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, but they did call for a quorum when the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] offered his amendment, and they demanded a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment of the Senator from Florida, who had a splendid case. Then here comes the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] with 48 civil cases and 170 criminal cases, and they do not call a quorum and do not have a yea-and-nay vote. The amendment goes in and he just gets the additional judge. Pie, pie, pie!

There are 11 more of these cases. What are you going to do with them? Of course, we ought to give the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] another judge. He came before the committee. He was very diligent and argued his case, but his case was not much better than many of the other districts. We refused him an additional judge. Because his judges were diligent, were good men and cleared the docket, we would not let him have an additional judge.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Our judges have a rule that if no motion or action is taken in a case within a year, it is stricken from the docket.

Mr. OVERMAN. They are good judges.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The showing as to the number of cases is not a true test of the amount of business transacted by them.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true, and those judges know their business, no doubt. Many cases should be stricken right off the docket if the lawyers are not ready to try them. Some judges know how to transact the business of a court. Others do not, and so they think we ought to give them two or three additional judges because they are lazy and do not know how to run the business of the court.

Now I come to California. I am sorry my friend from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] is not here. He made a splendid fight for his judges. He was diligent. He came before the committee. He did not wait to come to the floor of the Senate to get a piece of pie. He made his case before the committee. We allowed him one additional judge, and after allowing him one he came in again and was allowed a second judge, one for each district.

The northern district of California has how many cases to be tried? It has only 147, while Judge Connor tries 700; but another judge is granted to that district.

The southern district of California has two judges. How many cases are there to be tried? There are 129. Judge Connor tries 700 cases; but it is proposed to give that district another judge to try the 129 cases.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Carolina think it is fair to judge of this bill by the number of prohibition cases or criminal cases that are to be tried?

Mr. OVERMAN. I refer to criminal cases.

Mr. CUMMINS. Take California, for instance. There are 2,419 civil cases pending in the northern district court there.

Mr. OVERMAN. There are only 490 in the southern district.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is just as necessary to try the civil cases as it is to try the criminal cases; but if the judges give all their time to criminal cases of course they can not try the civil cases.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to be fair in my statements. I said in the beginning that I was going to base my whole argument on the number of criminal cases, because, as I understand, this bill, so far as providing additional judges is concerned, is based upon the large number of criminal cases.

In the southern district of California, where an additional judge is allowed, there are 538 criminal cases, including prohibition, narcotic, white slave, and all other cases, and there are only 490 civil cases.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that one of the judges from California, a very able judge, has been holding court in New York, and I know he has held court in Nevada and elsewhere; indeed, he is giving considerable time to the holding of court in other States. Obviously, if there were any great pressure of public business in California, Judge Van Fleet, of whom I am speaking, could not be absent on so many occasions holding court in other places.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may trespass upon the time of the Senator from North Carolina long enough to do so, I wish to say that there have been at least two judges from other districts and other States called into the northern district of California during the last year, and they have sat there for a very considerable length of time.

I do not know with regard to the particular judge of whom the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] speaks, but the circuit judges of that circuit are doing the best they can fully to utilize the judicial force; that is all. It means nothing that a district judge in California is sent to another part of the country to try cases. It is simply the utilization of the judicial force. I am sure the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] feels that that is true.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, these judges like to go about from place to place. I went over to New York, having been summoned there as a witness in a court, and I there found a judge sitting who, I think, was from Oregon or Washington, I do not know which. I refer to Judge Cushman. He sat there trying cases for seven weeks. There is a judge there now from North Carolina. He likes to go to New York occasionally; all the judges like to go there. They get $10 a day and have a good time. If judges should stay at home and try their own cases, they would get along much better.

I think if this bill is passed, making wholesale provision for so many judges, they will have nothing to do but to loaf, to go off to summer resorts and have a good time.

Mr. President, public officers ought to attend to the public business; they ought to work. Judges should understand they have got to work, to work as the judges of the State courts work. The judges in the State of North Carolina last year tried 9,000 cases and there were but 20 judges. The supreme court and superior court judges of the State sit almost constantly, but it seems that in the Federal courts the judges, for some reason or other, can not do that. I am sure I do not know why.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the unfairness of the statistics which have been furnished us. It is stated that there are 152,000 cases to be tried in the United States. I desire to ask of the Attorney General how many bankruptcy cases there are? There are 27,000. How many draft cases? Ah, of draft cases there are 37,000. So we have 27,000 bankruptcy cases and 37,000 draft cases, many of which are never going to be tried, or which at least will not take much of the time of the judge. That makes a big hole in the total of 152,000 cases. There is where the statistics are juggled. I will not say "juggled"—I take that back—but the figures are sent to us in that way. We should examine them, however, from a judicial standpoint.

I venture to say that if the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who was an able judge when he sat on the bench, will go through these statistics, remembering his own experience on the bench, he will conclude that half the judges provided for in the pending bill are not necessary. My friend, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], has also sat on the bench. I ask him as a judge who has sat on a bench in a State court to take these figures and go over them, and if he will do so I am satisfied that he will not vote for the pending bill.

My friend, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and I, if we sat down at a desk, could get together and agree on the number of judges who are actually needed. That number would not be 20, it would not be 18, it would not even be 15; but we could agree on the proper number. It would not be over 10.

So, Mr. President, I do not think the pending bill ought to be passed. I think we should pass through the Senate bills providing for judges as they are needed. Should there be any others needed, let Senators introduce a bill in each instance; have it go before the Committee on the Judiciary; if the judges are needed, let the bill be reported favorably, and let the Senate pass it; but do not let us pass a bill providing in a wholesale manner for additional judges.

As to New York, we have taken care of that State; as to Michigan, we have taken care of that State. We have also taken care of Minnesota, of Montana, of Florida, and other States. The Senate has previously passed a bill providing an additional judge for Florida, but for some reason or other the Senate committee has left that item out of this bill, although it was included in the House bill.

Mr. President, I now come to this section 2, which is bodily taken from a judicial bill which was previously before the Senate. That bill provided for roaming judges; it provided that a judge from North Carolina might be sent to try cases in Oregon, although the North Carolina judge does not know anything about the laws in Oregon or the conditions in Oregon or the methods of life there. Likewise, that bill provided that a judge might be taken from New Jersey and sent to North Caroline to try cases there, such a judge being entirely unacquainted with our laws and with our conditions. That is what is now proposed to be done—to sweep judges around all over the United States; to send them from one State to another. That proposition would not go down the throats of the Judiciary Committee. There was no trouble about killing that bill; but they did take from that bill a section which, in my judgment, is vicious, and that is embodied in this bill as section 2.

What is that section? It is now said we are going to take care of every State; we are going to give almost everybody who asks for it a piece of "pie"; we are going to take care of all of them. Therefore, we will put in section 2, so that the circuit judges of the United States may gather here in Washington next fall, on the 1st day of September, sit down with the Chief Justice, and assign the judges around through the country, whether they wish to go or not; take a judge by the nape of the neck and send him wherever it is desired that he shall go. That is to be done here in Washington by a few judges sitting around a table at the Willard Hotel, getting $10 a day. What is the use of that? Section 2 allows that to be done. Under the present law, where it is necessary for a judge to be sent from one court to another, that may be done. Then why this section of the bill which allows the circuit judges to gather here in Washington and send the district judges around through the country?

Oh, Mr. President, this bill will not do. It is wrong in principle. It is the worst kind of a pork-barrel bill; it bears every earmark of a pork-barrel bill; and worse than all, it is a juggling pork-barrel bill. I can not understand the idea of creating judges by wholesale in a pork-barrel bill at a cost to the taxpayers of this country of a quarter of a million dollars when the proposed new judges are not needed. It will not do to pass this bill. We ought to vote it down. Senators whose States are provided for, who have obtained a piece of pie in this bill, ought to vote against it; arise above selfishness. Then, if they can prove to the committee and prove to the Senate that an additional judge is needed in any district of the United States, separate bills may be introduced, as has been the practice for more than 100 years, and action can be taken upon the merits of each case. I say that this is the first time in 120 years that legislation of this character has been brought before the Congress. It is a repetition of history; it is on all fours with the bill which was passed early in the history of the Government which brought scandal and criticism. Such an effort ought not to be repeated in this day and time, for it is wrong and will bring disrepute on our judiciary. Let us keep our skirts clean and do right in this matter. Let the House act upon the separate bills which have been passed by the Senate; let them be considered as independent bills upon their merits, instead of considering an omnibus bill creating 19 or more new additional judges. With 2 Senators from each State and 19 States provided for, 38 Senators are affected, and with another judge provided for 2 more Senators are affected; thus by their votes we expect another pork-barrel bill to win out. By this method forty-odd votes; and then if 16 more judges are provided for in the bill, there will be about 70 Senators whose States will be affected by the measure and who will be inclined to vote for it. Are Senators going to vote for this measure because they are given a piece of pie? Are they going to vote for this bill because they have been taken care of? I do not think they will. I think they are going to vote on this bill on its merits; if they do, this bill will be defeated. I ask Senators not to vote on the bill, however, until they have examined the statistics. Some of my colleagues have been judges on the bench in their States. I ask them to look at the statistics. Let us send this bill back to the committee, and then let the Senator from Iowa, who is a fair man, and I get together and agree on what is needed in this country, and not create additional judgeships by wholesale because, forsooth, the party in power may appoint 25 Republican judges for life with large salaries involving great appropriations.

The people were promised by that party a reduction in the number of offices, a lessening of taxation, and reduced appropriations. As usual, this promise was a broken promise. This bill will increase the expenses of the Government by a quarter of a million dollars or more when all the judgeships proposed to be created are provided for. What will the little fellow think who holds or, perhaps, desires to hold some minor office? He will say, "You just railroaded through by wholesale a lot of judges who are to hold great offices for life. Are you going to cut down the number of poor clerks in offices which probably need more assistance than is needed by the Federal courts?"

Mr. President, I have no more to say on this question. I hope I have been fair. I did not intend to criticize any particular judge, but I have taken the statistics and shown that, as compared with the North Carolina judge, who lives in a pretty good section of the country, where perhaps there are no great cities but where there are many cases to be tried, the Federal judiciary is not overworked. Judges in North Carolina try cases; they know how to try them; they hold court; they do not loaf on the job; they do not go to the springs every summer and let the courts go to thunder. They try cases and keep their dockets cleared. As a matter of fact, I might say that the statistics show that North Carolina, with her two districts, is more entitled to judicial help than half of the States which have been provided for. Some Senator said to me, "OVERMAN, why do you not ask for a new judge for North Carolina?" I said, "We do not need an additional judge, because in North Carolina judges work and the cases are disposed of."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not want to take the time of the Senate to any extent. The burden of the criticism by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] seems to be that I have failed somewhat in my duty to my State and to my constituents—first, in not having the House include an additional judge in the House bill; secondly, because I did not present the claims of my State to the Judiciary Committee; and, thirdly, because I did not introduce a special bill. The Senator also complains that I should have known long ere this of the condition of the courts in my State and the congestion of the calendar or the docket.

It is true, Mr. President, that for nearly two years I have known of this condition, and it has been a matter of considerable discussion in conference with the judges in New Jersey, as well as with the Department of Justice. I myself wished to be cautious and absolutely sure that an additional judge was needed. I deliberately took occasion to discuss with the lawyers in my State, the State bar association, and the Federal judges the question as to whether we actually did need an additional judge.

I conferred with some of the Federal judges, as well as the Department of Justice, and it was only recently, after the bill had come to the Judiciary Committee, that the president of our State bar association brought to me the facts concerning the present situation in New Jersey and the condition of the docket. I was busily engaged in committee work and called it to the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the chairman of the subcommittee, and he suggested that I bring up the matter before the Senate, so that I might present the claims of my State to the Senate. I still claim that that is my privilege and right and that I am not to be criticized for presenting the claims of my State even at this late day.

We have heard a great deal of talk about "pie" and "pork." I should say that the Senator from North Carolina was criticizing me somewhat for attempting to get this judge on the ground that I was trying to secure patronage for my State. Anyone who knows about the difficulty of selecting a judge and the numerous claimants for the position will know that it has no political value whatsoever; that it is only an embarrassment; that it is very awkward; and that as a political question it creates more enemies than friends.

My claim to the additional judge and the reason why I have introduced the amendment is the fact that the docket of New Jersey is congested; that we need this additional judge. New Jersey has grown rapidly in population, and with the growth of population comes more litigation and more crime, I regret to say; and therefore, as these cases accumulate, the judges are overburdened, and the only way this condition can be relieved and additional court facilities provided is through legislation by this body. The only question before this body is, therefore, whether or not an additional judge in the third circuit is merited; and upon the facts of the case I rest my claim.

I pointed out yesterday that there were some 13,000 cases in New Jersey. It is true that 10,000 of these are draft cases; but there are over 2,000 civil, admiralty, criminal, prohibition, and United States civil cases. I know that the district of Florida has as many, and a few more; and if I had known this condition yesterday I most certainly would have voted, on the facts, for an additional judge for Florida, because I believe one is needed. I did not know those facts, and if the opportunity occurs again I most certainly shall vote for an additional judge in Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very much gratified to hear the Senator's statement with reference to the southern district of Florida. I am satisfied that a good many Senators who voted against that amendment yesterday would have voted for it if they had been able to attend the session here and hear the facts related and the conditions actually explained. I want to suggest to my good friend from New Jersey that there is one way in which he can very easily correct that situation. Having voted against that amendment, it would be entirely in order for him to move to reconsider; and I believe that upon such a motion as that the Senate would concur with him, and we could have that matter reconsidered and properly attended to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I inquire of the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Florida whether this is a new entangling alliance?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It absolutely is not. I have made no statement except that I intend to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Florida if it comes up again.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because, if it is, it is contrary to the Republican platform.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thank the Senator from Mississippi very much for his suggestion, but I want to say that the insinuation is not warranted or merited.

Mr. President, I have a letter from one of the Federal judges which I want to read to the Senate. I think the only thing that I have to prove is whether or not another judge is needed in New Jersey, and then leave it to the judgment of the Senate. There is where I rest the claims of my State.

I quote from a letter recently received by me:

> At the instance of Harvey F. Carr, Esq., president of the New Jersey State Bar Association, I submit for your consideration some of the reasons that occur to me why the United States court of this district should have an additional judge. I shall not refer to the number of cases, etc., for these give but a part of the story, the omitted part being the more illumining and instructive; besides these may all be obtained by referring to the Attorney General's reports. Neither will I dwell upon the fact that there is a constant increase of litigation in the United States courts, due to enlarged commercial activities and the continuing extension of the jurisdiction of these courts. In those respects this district is no different from the other districts. But the New Jersey district is unique in several particulars which augment to an abnormal degree the litigation brought into its court.
> First. Its geographical position.
> (a) It has an extended seacoast, and borders on the harbors of New York and Philadelphia, by reason of which it obtains a large admiralty and maritime business.
> (b) It lies between the metropolis and the large commercial and manufacturing city of Philadelphia, and the proprietors of many of the businesses carried on in those places have their citizenship and residences in this district, which is responsible for much of the litigation therein, founded upon diversity of citizenship.
>
> (c) Many railways, including almost all the transcontinental lines, cross the State to reach the seaboard, by reason of which the work of the United States court in this district in cases of railway accidents, violations of the Federal safety appliance and hours of service laws, and stealings of freight carried in interstate commerce, is abnormally increased.
>
> Second. The State is the domicile of the greater number of the large corporations—large in capitalization and scope of activities.
>
> By far the greater part of the business of these corporations is carried on outside of the district, but by reason of their domicile or citizenship being in this State, they are frequently made defendants in litigation instituted in the United States court, regardless of where the cause of action arose.
> The increase of litigation in the court of this district, due to the State's policy of securing under its laws the incorporation of the larger capitalizations of the country, is reflected in all branches of its jurisdiction, but principally in civil causes, both at law and in equity. The litigation of alleged infringement of patents is unusually large and burdensome, by reason of this domiciliary condition.
>
> The suit of Buckeye Powder Co. v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours Powder Co. for damages sustained for violation of the antitrust act, tried before me with a jury several years ago, consumed nearly five months' time. The alleged conspiracy was laid in another State, and of a very large number of overt acts alleged to have been committed in different parts of our country not a single one was laid in New Jersey. The only reason for bringing the suit in this district was because the defendant had been incorporated in this State.

I have a letter from another judge, which I will also read:

> I saw a copy of a letter which Judge ——— wrote you a short time ago with reference to the desirability of another Federal judge for the district of New Jersey. I heartily indorse all that he said. There is, however, another fact which I think should be called to your attention. This State, as you know, for a long time has been the home of a very large number of the great corporations of the world. This brings much litigation to the Federal courts of New Jersey, but the importance of that litigation can not be appreciated from the number of cases appearing on the dockets of the court. The real importance is due to the amount involved in those cases, it sometimes being as much as $50,000,000. This point could not be discovered in a tabulation of the number of cases arising in this district as compared with the number arising in other districts. I am sure that you would confer a very great favor upon the people of New Jersey if you could have an additional Federal judge for New Jersey included in the bill now before Congress.

Here is another letter from a member of a very prominent firm of lawyers in New Jersey:

> The accumulation of business undisposed of in the Federal courts is too well known to require detailed description. The present judicial machinery in many jurisdictions, New Jersey being one of them, is barely sufficient to dispose of current demands, without reference to the arrears. Delays in the trial and disposition of cases long at issue are so pronounced as to, in many instances, amount to denial of justice. Overworked judges are doing the best they can, but impatient litigants can not be made to understand why their causes are not heard, and questions involving sometimes the very life of important business enterprises remain undecided. Delay in the administration of criminal justice is indefensible and is the occasion of much discontent. But, laying aside entirely this branch of Federal jurisdiction, the congestion of the civil business extends to every field. The calendars are crowded with untried patent, bankruptcy, common-law, and equity cases, and it is not going too far to say that one of the causes retarding the restoration of normal business conditions arises out of the locking up in the courts of large sums, badly needed by their owners, and withheld from them by the failure of the courts to function promptly in the disposition of litigated issues and in the distribution of assets under judicial administration.
> The passage of Senate bill 2433 apparently offers a practical remedy for the clearing up of the arrears of business and the prevention of recurrence of like conditions, without permanent addition of unnecessary judges. The temporary expense to be incurred will be money well spent, and even in these times, when economy of public expenditure is of the utmost importance, no thoughtful person can reasonably object to the plan of relief proposed. It offers much better hope of practical relief than the additional appointment of permanent judges in the more congested districts, and will furnish a method of dealing with the arrears of business, flexible in application, and offering general relief to a greater extent than heretofore proposed by any plan which I have seen.

In this letter the writer speaks of Senate bill 2433.

I have a letter from the president of the New Jersey Bar Association, and I want to say for the New Jersey bar that New Jersey has always been known and respected for the standard of its courts. The judges of its State courts are appointed by the governor. The courts have always been bipartisan. The Republicans always recognize the traditional policy that a court should be evenly balanced, and there have been an equal number of Democratic and Republican judges. That traditional policy has never been violated. I know that when President Wilson was governor he reappointed Republicans whose terms expired, and that policy has been followed when we had Republican governors. So the standards of our courts have always been maintained upon a very high level. We have been somewhat proud of that, proud of New Jersey justice, and proud of the decisions and of the high intellectual attainments of our judges.

So it has been with the bar. They have always fought to keep political influence out of our courts. Therefore, in present ng this amendment, I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina that I have no political interest in this whatsoever. The bench and the bar have appealed to me to present the claims of the State of New Jersey to the Senate. They know better than I what the condition is, and I take their word for it. They have brought to me the facts which I have read to the Senate as to what the condition is. They have pointed out the location of New Jersey, and how important these cases are. I therefore bring this appeal to the Senate to adopt this amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rise to inquire of the Senator from New Jersey if any action has ever been taken by either House on a separate bill for the creation of an additional judgeship for New Jersey?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; and that was the criticism of the Senator from North Carolina of my action in presenting this amendment. I do not think the Senator from Montana was in the Chamber when I told the Senator from North Carolina the reason why I had not offered a separate bill.

In the last year I have been trying to make an investigation of the condition of the Federal courts in New Jersey, and have conferred with the various judges. Before I urged this I wanted to see whether it was absolutely necessary; whether the 10,000 draft cases would ever be tried; whether the present numerous violations of the Federal prohibition law would continue; whether those cases would diminish rather than increase; whether they were making any headway with the civil cases and the admiralty cases; whether the congestion was due to the fact that the three judges were neglecting their duty. All those questions were taken up, and I have satisfied myself that this judge is absolutely necessary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then the Senator can assure us that the delay was not in order that a Republican President might come in, so that a Republican judge might be appointed?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That was not the reason at all. I do not know how long we have had three judges, but I know that there are three now, and I think there was one added possibly during President Wilson's term. I want to make some investigation of that. But, as I pointed out before, no one realizes how conditions have changed in my State. We lie between New York and Philadelphia, and New Jersey has increased in population very rapidly, increasing the burdens of the courts, and increasing the litigation. Crime has increased, and the Federal prohibition act has brought a great deal of additional work to those courts. Notwithstanding the fact that we have apparently in that district a large number of judges, the conditions I have stated show why the docket has so many cases on it, and the crowding is also due to the fact that these important corporation cases are tried there, by reason of the fact that the corporations have a situs in our State, are incorporated there, and those cases are brought to our courts to be tried. If the Senator will make some inquiry from any of the prominent lawyers or judges in my State, whom he undoubtedly knows, he will find that I am not exaggerating that condition.

I just want to read a part of a letter from the president of our New Jersey Bar Association, a body who are very conservative and very cautious, who finally came to the conclusion stated here. They did not bring these findings to me until after the bill was in the Senate committee. They would not recommend this unless they knew that it was absolutely necessary. This is from Harvey F. Carr, of the firm of Carr & Carroll, Camden, N. J. I think he was one of our State judges. He said in the letter:

> With the exception of the southern district of New York, and possibly one or two other districts, New Jersey has more active civil cases on its docket than any other. Its equity and admiralty list is exceeded by only two or three districts in the country. The same is true of the bankruptcy cases. I have been holding this letter awaiting definite statistical information, but I have decided to forward the same, and as soon as the statistical information is received to send it to you. Much of this information can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of December 9, 1921. I am not quite sure of the date, but this is within a day or two of it.
> There is such a congestion of business in our Federal courts that it takes about a year and a half to get a case tried. The condition is not a temporary one but has been the result of steady growth, due, doubtless, to the great increase in population in this State and the proximity of the cities of New York and Philadelphia. It is not generally realized that Newark, N. J., is a larger city than Cincinnati or New Orleans, and that Jersey City has a greater population than Rochester, N. Y.; Portland, Oreg.; or Denver, Colo.
>
> We have in this district three hard-working, efficient judges, who are doing everything humanly possible to handle the work of the court, but they are unable to stem the tide of constantly increasing business. There is no deadwood on the dockets; inactive cases are not permitted to encumber the trial lists. The cases handled here are of great importance on account of New Jersey being the domicile of so many of the great corporations.
> I am sending you herewith a number of letters referring to the need of an additional Federal judge in New Jersey. You will note that the New Jersey State Bar Association and the following county bar associations have declared in favor of an additional judge: Essex County, Hudson County, Passaic County, Mercer County, Camden County, Gloucester County, Cumberland County, Monmouth County, and Morris County. It is the opinion of the entire bar of this State, as well as that of the Federal judges in this district, that an additional judge is urgently needed.

Mr. President, I have tried to show that I have no other motive in offering this amendment than to see that the proper court facilities are afforded my State. Of course, if the Senate believes, after listening to this evidence, that there is nothing in this claim, that they do not need the additional judge, I will submit to their judgment, but the Senate is composed of able lawyers, the ablest in the country, and I object seriously to having my motives questioned, and to having Senators say this is a piece of pie or pork, when the judges of my State and its bar association present the facts upon which they rest their claim.

I submit the facts in this case, and I ask the Senate for its common-sense judgment, which will result, I know, in the granting to New Jersey an additional judge.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course, you could get a petition of pretty nearly a majority of the bar, and of a great many other people, from almost any judicial district in the Union for another judge. That goes without saying.

A moment ago, when I interjected that mild international inquiry into the debate, as to whether there was an entangling alliance between the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], I meant really to be funny, and sometimes my desire to be funny leads me into some degree of trouble; but if anybody is prepared to take it seriously I am prepared to make it serious. It does appear from the facts in the case that the Senator from New Jersey found no virtue in the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida until after the Senator from New Jersey had made up his mind to offer a similar amendment. Then, after he had made up his mind to offer a similar amendment, he discovered for the first time that the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida was meritorious.

Whether he voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida or did not vote at all, I do not remember; at any rate, he discovered America immediately after Christopher Columbus had announced that he had it in sight.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURSUM in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator will inform himself by referring to the RECORD, he will find that the Senator having this bill in charge offered this amendment for me practically at the same time the bill was reported; that I had spoken to the Senator from Iowa, who is handling the bill, of this demand from my State, and he suggested that I offer an amendment. I did not even know that an amendment was on the desk providing for a judge in Florida or any other judge. I simply asked the Senator from Iowa to present the claims of my State and introduce the amendment for me, which he very kindly did, and it was not until yesterday that the Senator from Iowa said to me, "I think your State is entitled to a judge, but you voted against Florida, and Florida has the same number of cases on the docket that you have."

I wish to say further that if the Senator thinks there is any entangling alliance or any agreement, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course, I am opposed to "entangling" alliances. However, in contradistinction to the Senator from New Jersey, I have been in favor of alliances which I thought "disentangled" things. I am always glad to receive enlightenment, and the Senator has just enlightened me. He now confesses that he voted against the amendment for an additional judge for Florida, but that he voted against it because he was not sufficiently informed at the time as to the merits of the amendment, but that when informed by the Senator from Iowa that New Jersey stood upon exactly an equal footing with Florida, as he contends, and which I deny, he discovered unexpected merits in the Florida amendment.

If the Florida amendment will carry two votes for this bill, and if the New Jersey amendment will carry two votes, that means four, and while I will not regard it as an entangling alliance for fear of violating the Republican platform, having lost my respect for George Washington, as the Republican Party has, and therefore not now quoting him, I must still insist that if anybody proposes to take what I said seriously, I am prepared to make it serious.

Now, Mr. President, the main argument made by the Senator from New Jersey in favor of giving New Jersey an extra judge is that New Jersey has issued so many corporation charters that the cases in very many instances must be tried in the New Jersey Federal courts. If there is any way in the world to make New Jersey quit issuing trust charters, some of which contain—or used to contain and I suppose do yet—a provision that they shall not operate in New Jersey, then the deprivation of a judgeship for the State of New Jersey is one of the least punishments I can think of, and perhaps an efficacious one, though I doubt if it would be efficacious. I do not see much in that argument. New Jersey had better quit violating the interstate ethics of the Union and issuing all sorts of charters to trusts and combinations, to some of which she denies the liberty of doing business within her own boundaries, and then she will not have so many cases. She need not ask us to create a new judgeship in order to aid her to violate interstate comity and ethics.

Mr. President, of course when the question is asked whether a new judge is needed in a given territory the answer depends very much upon the qualifications of the existing judiciary there. Without knowing anything about the condition in New Jersey, and, therefore, without asserting anything, I recall right now a case where a Federal judge had gotten behind between two and three years with his docket, and where matters had reached a stage such that the lawyers within his judicial district carried their cases into the State courts whenever they could in order to avoid the jurisdiction of that judge. He had a habit of putting business over until "a more convenient day." Then he died and another man was appointed in his place. The other man in two sessions of the court cleaned up the docket. In that particular case it was not so much a new court that was needed as it was a new judge, and that is frequently the case.

I do not remember that New Jersey was ever neglected in connection with legislation. New Jersey is a doubtful State. No doubtful State is ever neglected. All you have to do as a rule is to prove that you are a doubtful State and then you can, if your party in Congress happens to be in the majority, secure the passage of nearly all the private bills that you want. That is not all. Maybe you can get a President, maybe you can get two or three Presidents, one after another. Why, Mr. President, when the eternal choir is formed on judgment day and the people are seeking special privileges in the way of getting to heaven I expect to see the doubtful States of the United States attempting to interfere with the angelic choir long enough to state that they are doubtful States and ought to be specially considered.

Be that as it may, I can not imagine New Jersey having been neglected with regard to judgeships or anything else, even with this new plea that because of the frequent issue of charters to trusts and combines she has brought upon herself an increase of litigation.

Now, Mr. President, to be serious for a moment——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will postpone being serious for a moment. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I was going to ask the Senator in what way he referred to New Jersey as a doubtful State? Does he mean in the coming political contest?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know what New Jersey may do in a coming political contest. I doubt if the Lord would permit the archangels to guess—and it would only be a guess now on their part—what New Jersey was going to do in the future. I was merely referring to the history of New Jersey politically. She has been doubtful in the past. If there is any way for New Jersey to be consistent with her record of the last few years I suppose she will vote the Republican ticket; but there are two mighty good things about New Jersey. One is that the floating population, chiefly of aliens, is awfully uncertain, and nobody knows beforehand what they are going to do.

The other good thing about New Jersey is that the old, staid farmer population of the State have some mighty good principles, and they are apt to turn from one party to another upon a point of ethics and morals. If they happen to hold the balance of power during any election as between the two conflicting parties of aliens they will carry the State. They can not carry it unless the hyphenates are divided among themselves. So I do not know what New Jersey is going to do in the future. I would be a fool to attempt to predict, but I merely state the historical fact that she had been a doubtful State and that she has collected for in many ways—tariff ways, legislative ways, judgeship ways—I believe the little State now has three Federal judges—and in various other ways.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I admit we were doubtful when we elected Mr. Wilson, but that cured us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That speaks mightly badly for New Jersey's stomach. Here are a people who take good medicine of the very best description—idealism, altruism, high purposes, civic righteousness, and world peace twice or more from Doctor Wilson, and now the Senator tells us that it disagreed with their stomach. There are people who can not get along on natural food, who can not get along on wholesome food, with whom milk disagrees, with whom butter disagrees, with whom plain bread disagrees. But let not the Senator fool himself about that. When New Jersey voted for Woodrow Wilson she honored herself and not him. When she voted for him for governor and President both she honored herself twice. It may be that in fulfillment of the Senator's devout political wishes she may disgrace herself hereafter, but at least that much of her past is safe and registered near the throne of God somewhere as a good act for the peace of the world and for civic righteousness.

The Senator can not get away from Woodrow Wilson if he wants to, and therefore he is foolish to mention him. He will be praying after a while to be rid of the memory of his opposition to Woodrow Wilson. If he lives the allotted age of man he will be praying several years before he dies to be relieved from the memory of it. Even New Jersey will, after a while, come to see that she was right twice and wrong afterwards.

Why, Mr. President, with the possible exception of David Lloyd-George—aye, without any exception—Woodrow Wilson stands to-day before thinking manhood and womanhood, not only of America but of the world, as the greatest and most unselfish man in political life who has during this generation grasped God's purposes in the history of the world, the man who has most clearly seen the God in history, as Mommsen calls him, der Göttin der Geschichte, and has seen how the God in history uses the instrumentalities of the common man's common sense and common conscience, for the purpose of working out his own plan, God's plan, for the coming of the peace of the world, and the upbuilding of the progress and civilization of the world.

I do not mean to be deflected from this little funny talk into a general exordium or eulogy, but long, long after the Senator from New Jersey dies, long, long after Woodrow Wilson—crippled in the Great War for world peace—has gone to his well-earned rest, the Senator's grandchildren and great-grandchildren will wonder how he ever could have said a disrespectful word of the greatest public man of his generation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Oh, no, Mr. President; far be it from me to reflect personally on the former President of the United States in any manner whatsoever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say it was personal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator was discussing, I thought in a humorous vein, the political situation in New Jersey. I have refrained and I mean to refrain from any personal reflection on ex-President Wilson at any time whatsoever. In the heat of political campaign oftentimes that is done, but the Senator knows that on this floor I have never done that. I may disagree with President Wilson as to politics, but when it comes to any personal attack on him or any personal affront, the Senator knows I have never indulged in any such thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not use the word "personal" at all. I said "a disrespectful word"—politically disrespectful, historically disrespectful, philosophically disrespectful, even religiously disrespectful, if the Senator believes with me in the philosophy of Jesus of Nazareth. I am glad to learn that the Senator is beginning to apologize even earlier than I thought he would, and so the task of apology will not be left to his children and his grandchildren.

Now, Mr. President, to say a few serious words about the pending bill. The bill ought to be either fish, flesh, or fowl. It ought to be made one or the other. Either we ought to pursue the old time-honored practice of giving an additional judge to the territory which actually needs it, upon proof made to the committees of the House and Senate and upon vote taken in those two bodies, gradually increasing the judiciary as the needs of litigation require—either we ought to do that, or we ought to subscribe to the intent of the bill and organize a "flying squadron" annexed to the supreme Federal judiciary at Washington, to be sent wherever it may be desired.

We ought either to keep up the time-honored practice or else we ought to follow the theory of the bill as it was first promulgated and undertake to organize a squadron of light cavalry or dragoons on the outskirts of the judiciary system to protect it from congestion within. We ought to do one or the other. We ought not to mix them up. The bill ought to be fish, flesh, or fowl, one or the other. There ought to be some reliable theory running through it. If you are going to pass a bill for a flying squadron or light dragoons of the judiciary—a perambulatory crowd of judges to be floating in space throughout the entire United States and spending more money, perhaps, for mileage and per diem than for their salaries—then you ought to do that and be done with it. John Adams tried it and failed; but you might, if you wish, try it over again. But you ought not to introduce a bill the principle of which is a perambulatory light dragoon flying skirmish-drill squadron and at the same time tack onto it various designations of judges in various particular areas and thereby gain Senatorial support for a general bill, in the general principles of which there appear to be many of the very Senators who have secured local judges who do not believe.

Now, make the bill one thing or the other. I am frankly opposed to a perambulatory judiciary, to carpetbagging Nebraska with a Louisianian, certainly to carpetbagging Mississippi or Louisiana with somebody north of Mason and Dixon's line, which will almost certainly happen if this bill passes. That is what it will come to; that is one of the things that it means; and I am opposed to it. I insist that I have a right to have the proposition voted upon fairly, and I insist that the vote will not be fair so long as one Senator after another gets a provision upon the bill creating a fixed judge for his judicial district. That is not fair; that is not a square way of legislating. Stand by your guns. Those of you who are in favor of the principles of this bill, vote it up or vote it down. If you vote it up, I shall not be hurt any more than will anybody else; if you vote it down, in my opinion, the country will be helped; but perhaps I am mistaken. However, make the bill fish, flesh, or fowl, and do not try to get votes for it by giving to special judicial districts, represented by certain Senators, a part of the "pie" in divergence from the general principle or theory of the bill. If it is going to be a national pie, or pretendedly so, without reward or largess to any Senator's State, then do not cut up the pie and distribute its slices to some for the sake of their votes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think all Senators are impressed with the importance of this proposed legislation. It deals with a fundamental principle of government. A delay of the trial of cases means a denial of justice, and a denial of justice hurts just as much if it comes by that route as though it came by one where actual corruption takes place. I realize, Mr. President, there are a great many places in the United States where there are not enough judges to transact the legitimate business that comes into the United States courts, and yet, after considering this measure with a great deal of soberness, I hesitate before I can bring myself to a state of mind where I can support this bill.

I hope that what I am going to say will be considered by no one as any reflection upon any individual, for I have no such intention. Some of the best officials of the Government are on the bench; some of the ablest and wisest and most patriotic and ablest and fairest men are judges of United States courts. That can not be said of all judges; it can not be said, of course, of all the State judges; but in what I shall say I am not intending at least to cast any reflection even upon the judiciary as a system. I certainly have no personal grievance against any judge. Those with whom I happen to be acquainted, I think, without exception, are able and conscientious men, who are doing their duty.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question. There may be exceptions, of course, but will not the Senator from Nebraska admit the general high character and ability of both Federal and State judges?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. I would admit it the same as I would admit that, as a general rule, Members of this body are high-class men. They are picked men; judges are picked men, but sometimes they are picked by politicians, and often mistakes are made when that is done. I am not willing to admit, and I do not believe, that the Federal district judges are any better class of men than are the general trial judges of the States.

I base that opinion upon my limited personal knowledge, experience, and observation. I do not know all of the judges, of course, either in the State or Nation; but, so far as I do know them, I am here to assert that the State judges, as a class, are just as able, just as competent, and just as good as are the Federal judges. About the only difference is that in most parts of the country the Federal judges work less and receive more pay.

Mr. President, to my mind, there is something fundamentally wrong with our judicial system. I know when I was a young man and started out in life, when I studied law and commenced to practice law, I thought it was the finest thing in the world; and in theory our Federal judicial system is fine. I do not think, however, it has worked out in practice so well as we would expect it to work out when we study only its theory.

From my experience in life, and especially in dealing with courts and lawyers, I have reached the conclusion that a life tenure of office is not good for the people; that while in theory the judge, appointed for life, is removed from temptation and has nothing but the straight and narrow path to follow—and often that is the result, as many judges have exemplified—yet too often the security of a life salary and a life position makes some men indifferent; it makes some forget the common people, the common run of humanity, the common folk, who are struggling, with more or less difficulty, to maintain themselves and those who are dependent upon them for a livelihood.

That is not the only objection to our judicial system; perhaps it is not an objection at all; I did not intend to offer it as one; but we have a duplicate system of judges in the United States. We have United States courts and United States judges, and then we have State courts and State judges. Thus there is a double set of judicial machinery in every community—two judges, two courthouses, a duplicate set of administrative officials, including marshals, sheriffs, clerks, and bailiffs, all doing the same kind of work, and the taxpayers footing the bill. It did not make so much difference years ago until great corporations began to be formed, until business began to be transacted on a large scale of combination, when litigation became important, involving more money. Then the fault in the system began to appear. To my mind, it is a serious problem and one which Congress should consider.

In my opinion this bill does not reach the fundamental error in our system, and I am inclined to think it would take a constitutional amendment to reach it. I do not expect to see that accomplished; I want, however, to call attention to the fault. I wish I could cause the American people to think about it, to work it over in their minds and in their hearts, and to realize that we have a judicial system that costs too much money. Justice is too expensive, Mr. President; so expensive, in fact, that the poor man can not afford to buy it.

Out in the more sparsely settled sections of the country, where the people, engaged in building up a new empire, are poorer, the places for holding United States court are hundreds of miles apart. I lived for a number of years in a town which was 250 miles from where the United States court sat. I have advised many and many clients who came to employ me as an attorney that they had better travel that 250 miles and hire a lawyer there, because I knew from my experience that cases are not tried the first time they are called; that delay ensues in one way or another because of technical proceedings; and that a man of ordinary means could not afford to hire a lawyer, pay his expenses and for his time while he closed up his office and traveled 250 miles, perhaps, to be in court five minutes and have the case continued until the next term, and carry his witnesses back and forth.

Mr. President, thousands and thousands of times this condition has meant bankruptcy for the man of ordinary circumstances who has been so unfortunate as to become involved in litigation in the United States courts. In saying this I mean no reflection on the court or the judge; I do not mean to intimate that justice would not be done when the case was reached for trial, but from the very nature of things such a condition means ruin in a financial sense.

Let me digress right there to inquire why is it that we have two sets of courts? Why should we not have only one set, so that all, rich and poor alike, could go into the same court? Our forefathers when they adopted the Constitution, I presume, felt that the judges in one State might be prejudiced against the people of another State, and that there ought to be a tribunal that would be fair as between the two. Is there anybody who believes that now? Is there any Senator here who will rise in his place and say that in his State a man from another State can not secure justice in the State courts? If there is, I pause to have him interrupt me. I should like to have the name of the State and be advised as to the character of its judiciary where a man from another State can not secure justice. It is only a fiction, Mr. President; there is nothing to that contention; it is all poppycock.

Whatever reason existed originally no longer exists. There is no reason why the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], if he comes down into Nebraska to sue me, should not be required to commence his suit in the State court of Nebraska. If he comes down into my State and—I will not say commits a crime, because I could not even have the heart to use an illustration of that kind with reference to the Senator from North Dakota—if he were charged there with the commission of a crime, let us say with murder, and he were arrested in that State, where would he be tried, Mr. President? He would be tried in that State. He would be tried before a State judge, in a State courthouse; and there would be no way on earth for him to escape that, or to get a change of venue into another State. It could not be done. Everybody admits that. Nobody claims that that would be unjust to him. Nobody thinks for an instant that he would not have a fair trial, and the defendant in that kind of a case himself would never have the first idea that he would like to be tried somewhere else. He gets justice, and that is all he wants.

Suppose, however, that he is a corporation, and he comes down into the State of Nebraska. Perhaps he was incorporated in New Jersey, and he gets into litigation down there. If by any hook or crook under the law he is a defendant, and is sued there, and they have the right kind of service on him, so that they can hold his corporation, the first thing he does is to file a motion and have his case transferred from a State court to a United States court. Why? The law permits it. It permits it on the theory that he may not get justice in that State; and yet, if his own life were at stake, nobody would suggest such a thing or think of such a thing. If his liberty were at stake, no one would question but that he would get justice there; but if he were a corporation it would be different. He would be entitled to go into a United States court, and if he were suing me, and I were a poor man, he would be able to wear me out. I would not be able to continue the fight in that court, and the result is that I would settle to begin with, and submit to wrong, and even degradation, in order to keep out of court.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, my observation in my own State—I do not know the condition in any other State—is very much as the Senator from Nebraska says. Whatever may have been the reason for giving the Federal courts jurisdiction originally, on account of diverse citizenship, to get justice, I do not think it exists now. I believe, and in fact I know, that there are several times more suits between parties having diverse citizenship brought in our State courts than there are in the Federal courts. In every county where they exist there are thousands more in the State courts; and the chief litigants resorting to the Federal courts on account of diverse citizenship, as the Senator from Nebraska says, are the corporations, which often are seeking delay or to wear out the defendants.

The suit is not ordinarily brought in the Federal court originally; but, whatever the reason was for that, as the Senator says, it is gone now. I think there is but very little prejudice anywhere against citizens of other States in the courts of the several States, and a man living in one State can get justice in another as fully as he could in his home State.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator, and I think every man will agree with what the Senator says; and he says it from his experience of many years as a lawyer and as a judge.

Mr. President, in the illustration I gave a while ago, if the Senator from North Dakota comes down into my State and is charged with the commission of a crime down there, there is just as much reason for him to say, "I am a citizen of North Dakota, and I want this case transferred," when his life or his liberty is at stake, as if only money were at stake; and yet, if he said it, it would be denied, while if dollars were at stake, and he said it, it would be granted.

Mr. President, I say again that that is no reflection upon United States courts or upon United States judges; but the fact remains that it is generally believed by the great common people of America that these two systems of courts, existing as I have described them, are for two classes of people—one for the rich and one for the poor. There is some foundation, as I have already described, for that belief, not based, however, upon any corruption of the courts or any disposition on the part of any judge not to do right or enforce the law properly, but from the very nature of the conditions in most of the country that is true.

Mr. President, I do not ask Senators to take my word about this belief. When I say that the people have lost faith in some of our courts I know that many people, perhaps some Senators, will say: "That is just the raving of a crazy man's mind; there is nothing to it." But, Mr. President, I am going to put some witnesses on the stand, and those who do not believe in things that I say simply because I say them will have to hold their breath when these witnesses testify.

I think it is a fact conceded by students—I can prove it by testimony as high as your desk, Mr. President, from eminent lawyers and judges and students and philanthropists of America—that our judicial system is not doing justice to rich and to poor alike; and let me say again that that is all without casting any reflection upon any man. It is due to the system. In my judgment we ought to abolish every United States district court in America; we ought to abolish entirely the United States Court of Appeals and leave nothing of our United States judicial system except the Supreme Court of the United States. We ought to give to State judges and State courts all the jurisdiction now held by United States judges and United States courts. We would have to have more judges of the States, I admit, but we would have no duplication. We would not have a complete outfit of judge, of marshal, of sheriff, of clerk, of deputy clerk, of deputy marshal, of deputy sheriff, of bailiff, and again of bailiff, a whole machinery sitting here in this courtroom presided over by a United States court, when across the street was another outfit exactly like it, presided over by a State judge, doing exactly the same kind of business, enforcing exactly the same principles of law, with absolutely no difference except that in the one case the judge drew a larger salary than the other, and the marshal got paid more than the sheriff, and the clerk of the United States court charged more for his work than the State clerk did, the taxpayers footing the bill. You can say it is charged up to litigants, but it comes out of the taxpayers of the country in the end. There is absolute duplication, and justice is not secured, because, as I said, in most of the country the transferring of a case from a State court to a United States court means that a poor man is worn out, and he submits to whatever the other fellow asks rather than lose everything he has traveling back and forth litigating, even though he knows that in the end he would be able to win his case.

Mr. President, to satisfy my friends who do not agree with my idea of government or of jurisprudence, let me read from one of their leaders, Elihu Root. Let us see what that great lawyer has to say. He says:

> No one, however, doubts that it is the proper function of government to secure justice. In a broad sense that is the chief thing for which government is organized. Nor can anyone question that the highest obligation of government is to secure justice for those who, because they are poor and weak and friendless, find it hard to maintain their own rights. * * *
> I do not think that we should be overharsh in judging ourselves, however, for the shortcomings have been the result of changing conditions, which the great body of our people have not fully appreciated. We have had in the main just laws and honest courts to which people—poor as well as rich—could repair to obtain justice. But the rapid growth of great cities, the enormous masses of immigrants (many of them ignorant of our language), and the greatly increased complications of life have created conditions under which the provisions for obtaining justice which were formerly sufficient are sufficient no longer. I think the true criticism which we should make upon our own conduct is that we have been so busy about our individual affairs that we have been slow to appreciate the changes of conditions which to so great an extent have put justice beyond the reach of the poor. But we can not confine ourselves to that criticism much longer; it is time to set our own house in order.

Mr. President, ex-Senator Root, when he uttered those memorable words, was not advocating a change such as I have suggested, I admit. He probably would be opposed to this change. Lawyers, as a rule, have not given it consideration. The people have realized that there was a prejudice, perhaps unconsciously so, against the United States courts, but they have not themselves understood just why. They are too apt to find fault with an unjust judge here and there, and blame the whole system. They know there is something wrong. It has not given justice to the poor. It has made justice too expensive. However, I cite ex-Senator Root, not in advocacy of what I am advocating but to show that my statement of the conditions I have outlined, which I gathered from my experience in another part of the country, is true, according to ex-Senator Root's experience in the most populous portion of the country, where injustice came about, and injustice, as he said, to the poor.

Mr. President, mark my words, when the great bulk of the people of the country get the idea that those who are poor can not get justice where those who are rich can, we have struck at the very foundation of our Government. Right or wrong, such an idea must not be permitted to have circulation. The condition must be made right if it is wrong, and if the criticism is unjustified, then a system of education must be spread over the country in order to convince the people that it is wrong.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. I regret that I did not hear all of the address of the Senator from Nebraska, as I am very much interested in the question to which he is calling the attention of the Senate. As I gather, the Senator maintains that the attitude of the mass of the people toward the Federal judiciary, and its failure to do complete justice between litigants who are rich and those who are poor, is due rather to the system than to the attitude of the judge himself?

Mr. NORRIS. I have said so. I will say to the Senator that before he came into the Chamber I tried to emphasize the fact that I was making no such charge against any judge.

Mr. STANLEY. So I gathered, and I heartily concur in that position. I have noticed in a late issue of Herbert Spencer's essays, "A Man Against the State," a very elaborate discussion of this question, and if I am not mistaken, a discussion of it by the present Chief Justice of the United States, in which it is pointed out that the cost incident to the prosecution of cases in the Federal court renders an appeal to the Federal judiciary by men of limited means practically impossible. Has the Senator gone into that phase of the question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have to some extent.

Mr. STANLEY. I just wanted to call it to his attention. I think that is one of the greatest troubles.

Mr. NORRIS. It is.

Mr. STANLEY. The custom of printing records and the expense of stenographer's reports have enormously increased the cost of judicial procedure.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not called attention to it specifically, but I am going to do so now, and I thank the Senator from Kentucky for calling my attention to it. The difference in cost between litigation in State courts and in United States courts is something enormous. I would ask Senators who are mostly lawyers and have practiced in United States courts and in State courts if it is not true that when a client came to them to try a case in the United States courts there was quite a different fee charged than when the case was pending in a State court, the same kind of a case, which would require the same study and the same work. I think universally the attorney's fee is greater to begin with. The marshal gets more fees than the sheriff. The clerk gets more fees in the United States courts, and, as the Senator from Kentucky says, when they carry the case from one court to another, there is a large stenographer's fee. Then there is the cost of printing the record. Expenses are doubled or trebled at every step of the litigation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I would suggest another item of additional expense. The United States judicial districts are very much larger than the State districts.

Mr. NORRIS. I have already called attention to that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Litigants have to travel long distances to the seat of the district to attend United States court.

Mr. NORRIS. Now I want to read some more testimony along the line of that which I read before. I am not going to read all I could, because I could fill the RECORD with this kind of testimony from eminent men.

Mr. STANLEY. At this point, Mr. President, not to break the continuity of the Senator's argument, I wish to remark that it has always impressed me that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated the establishment of district and circuit Federal courts for the cognizance of cases of which they now take jurisdiction.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator in that. I do not believe they ever thought of giving them the jurisdiction which has been given them by law. We could remedy that to a great extent by the enactment of a congressional act.

Now, I want to read something on this point from Henry S. Pritchett. Henry S. Pritchett is the president of the Carnegie Foundation. He said:

> The world is to-day filled with the word "democracy." Sometimes it is used to denote a government in which the civil rights of the individual rest upon a constitutional guaranty, sometimes to describe a class rule more autocratic than that of the Czar. An autocracy can exist without law, but a free democracy can not.

Listen to this!

> the very existence of free government depends upon making the machinery of justice so effective that the citizens of the democracy shall believe in its impartiality and fairness.

I tried a while ago, in my weak way, to bring that same idea out. It is not enough that we have justice, but in a free democracy such as he describes, if we are really to have freedom and a happy people, we must have a people who believe that they are getting absolute fairness and justice. I think it has been shown clearly that these do not exist where there are two systems which are not working harmoniously together, and in such a situation you can not expect the people to believe they get justice, because, as a matter of fact, it is not true.

Now, I want to read what was said by Mr. Taft, the present Chief Justice of the United States, bearing on the same point. Understand, I am not claiming that any of these men from whom I am reading would advocate the abolishment of the United States courts as I do, but the statement I make that there is a condition in the country where the poor can not get justice, that it is an impossibility on account of the system, that justice is too expensive, and that that condition is an alarming condition, and cries aloud to fairness and to justice and to Heaven for remedy, is borne out by the men from whom I am reading, and that is the object of their statements. Mr. Taft said:

> Of all the questions which are before the American people, I regard no one as more important than the improvement of the administration of justice. We must make it so that the poor man will have as nearly as possible an equal opportunity in litigating as the rich man—> and under present conditions, ashamed as we may be of it, this is not a fact.

Now, listen to this—

That is the statement of William Howard Taft, ex-President of the United States, now Chief Justice of the United States.

Mr. STANLEY. And a Federal judge for many years.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and it bears out my statement that under our system of dual jurisprudence there is justification for the common belief on the part of millions of common people that on account of their poverty alone justice does not reach the great masses of our people as it does those who are rich.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I may be mistaken, but as I recall the statement of Mr. Taft, to which the Senator referred, he at that time was addressing himself to the question of the cost of judicial procedure.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and it is a statement which plainly says that on account of the expense the poor can not get justice under our system.

Mr. POINDEXTER. He means that that is due to the jury system, does he not? I understand that Chief Justice Taft at one time advocated the abolishment of the jury system.

Mr. STANLEY. As I recall, he was not discussing the jury system at all; he was discussing the cost of judicial procedure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was referring to his general attitude toward the administration of justice. My recollection is that in an address he at one time advocated the abolishment of the jury system.

Mr. STANLEY. I do not think he ever went that far.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know about that. I have quoted from an address delivered by ex-President Taft before the Virginia Bar Association.

I want to read now an extract from Chief Justice Olson in the eighth and ninth annual report of the Chicago municipal court for 1915. It will be found on page 128 of that report. Chief Justice Olson said:

> When litigation is too costly, the result for many persons is a denial of justice. Such denial or partial denial of justice engenders social and commercial friction. The sense of helplessness thus caused incites citizens to take the law into their own hands.

Is there anybody here who will deny that? As ex-President Taft said, however much ashamed we may be of it, or however much we may dislike to admit that it is true, we know it to be true that a denial of justice, when known to the people against whom it is denied, means that they take the law into their own hands. Revolution, Senators, is the natural result of that, and a denial of justice to the common people, to the poor people, has been one of the causes of every revolution which has ever been recorded in history; and you may deny it for one cause or another—if it is denied, they fail to get it.

I read on from Judge Olson:

> It causes crimes of violence. It saps patriotism and destroys civic pride. It arouses jealousy and breeds contempt for law and government.

When we have a citizenship in that condition, Mr. President, our country is in a perilous condition.

Mr. STANLEY. The matter of patriotism in its last analysis is the mental attitude of the citizen toward the institutions of his country.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is, and of course that mental attitude can not be disassociated from the conditions that surround the citizen himself. If he is surrounded by injustice, it affects him. If he is happy and contented, it has the opposite effect.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would like to follow a little more intelligently the very interesting argument the Senator is making. Undoubtedly the Senator must refer to justice in civil proceedings rather than in criminal matters, because I suppose in criminal matters the justice is supposed to be administered without any expense to the defendant, and he is entitled to have counsel appointed if he is unable to procure counsel for himself.

With respect to civil actions, there is a great deal in what the Senator states, but is the Senator contending that it is more expensive for litigants to conduct suits in the Federal courts than in the State courts?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is my contention.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator from Montana inadvertently, I suggest, states his case a little too broadly. It is true, so far as criminal actions are concerned, that the defendant, of course, in the nature of things can not be put to any very great expense in defending himself for some violation of a Federal statute, but if the finding of the lower court does not suit him, then the question of expense becomes very vital to him on appeal. I have known a great number of cases where appeals have not been taken because of the expense incident to the appeal, and it is not such an easy thing always to go up in forma pauperis.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, it is always expensive to travel from remote sections of the country to Washington, but aside from that I do not know where the cost is involved.

Mr. STANLEY. It is in the costs of the appeal.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit a further interruption, he was referring to Judge Olson, a very estimable and very able judge as well as publicist. But I do not know just how he figures out the conclusion at which he arrives so far as his own country is concerned. I can not see the difference between a man trying a case in the Federal court in the city of Chicago and trying it in a State court in that city if he is obliged to appeal or does appeal in certain controversies.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether the Senator was here or not when I made my statement. I have not said that the men whose testimony I am reading would admit an agreement with me on the point I am discussing. So far as I know they would probably be opposed to it. They were not arguing the case I am arguing, but I am using their testimony to show that a state of facts existed which I had claimed, before I read their testimony, did exist.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They are deploring generally the cost of litigation.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. They are not discussing the question of the difference in expense; they are discussing the general proposition; but they have laid down certain facts, certain propositions, which I lay down, and I use their testimony to substantiate my position. I am suggesting what I believe to be not the only one, but one of the difficulties and one of the causes why this condition exists, and I am suggesting how it might be remedied.

I will say to the Senator from Montana that in my judgment the expense runs all through. Even though the man is in the same town where the United States court sits and the State court sits, it costs more money to try the case in the United States court than it does in the State court.

Mr. STANLEY. In the Senator's part of the country they are not in the same town.

Mr. NORRIS. Not very often.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what prompted my inquiry, because that is not my experience. My experience is that one can try a case in a Federal court in the city of Helena at no greater expense. In fact, until quite recently it was less expensive, because the fees of witnesses in the Federal court were $1.50, while the fees of witnesses in the State courts were $3.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator, when he was practicing law in the city of Helena, charge the same fee to a client in the United States court that he would in the same kind of a case in the State court?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know that there was any very material difference, assuming that the litigation was equally important and equally difficult. I do not think that would make any difference.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator's testimony is the exception to the rule. If you employ a lawyer to do a thing in a United States court, as a rule it is more expensive than to employ the same lawyer to do the same thing in a State court.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not able to offer any testimony along that line. I may say, so far as that is concerned, that I am not particularly partial to the United States court.

Mr. NORRIS. I have known men charged with crimes in a United States court who have said to me—of course, I did not have personal knowledge of the facts—that they have pleaded guilty to some small charge rather than go to the expense of fighting it and making a defense. You can talk about the expense being the same. As a matter of practice, so far as I have been able to observe it is not only not the same but I would say it is at least double in the United States court. The witnesses have to come very much farther, as a rule. They are liable to come 200 miles instead of 15 miles. You have to pay them, as a rule, save in the town where the United States court would be held, twice on the average what their attendance cost would be in the towns where the State courts are held. All the way through everything costs more.

Mr. STANLEY. I will say that in Kentucky, Indiana, and in the Mississippi Valley the cost of a record, the cost of obtaining witnesses, and so forth, are inordinately greater in the Federal courts than in the State courts. There are very few places excepted, a few large towns only, where the circuit court of appeals and the court of the district—usually a State is composed of one or two districts—are located in the same town. In fact, there is no such court of appeals, as I recall, in the State of Kentucky at all. We have to go outside of the State.

Mr. NORRIS. When two or three lawyers are traveling in Pullman cars and living in expensive hotels, all of which the clients have to pay, it means an enormous increase. I do not care to get my own individuality mixed in this matter, but I have a very distinct recollection of a friend of mine who lived in southwestern Nebraska, who was sued a great many years ago. It was the foreclosure of a mortgage. Whenever he had had any business there I had attended to it for him, and he came to see me about this matter. A claim was made under a mortgage foreclosure which he stated to me was very unjust and said he did not owe. The United States court was 250 miles away. From my office where he consulted me to the courthouse where that mortgage was recorded the distance was less than 3 blocks. If that case had been pending in that courthouse, I could have gone into court and attended to the motion that was necessary to make without expending half an hour's time and been back in my office. If I had permitted him to employ me, which I did not, I would have traveled 250 miles and looked into the case. I would have locked up my office while I was gone, and every lawyer knows that he can not afford to do that for an ordinary fee. I would have spent a week's time instead of 30 minutes' time, and he would have had to pay for it. As it was, he traveled the 250 miles, took my advice, with a letter of introduction, and hired a lawyer who was in the same city where the court was being held.

That is no exception. That man could better afford to have paid $250 extra than to litigate in that Federal court. He was in the United States court because some individual or corporation in New Jersey or some other State had bought the mortgage and was proceeding to foreclose it in the United States court there. I submit that is not justice. Does anyone call that justice? Is that the kind of justice with which we expect a people to be satisfied? Can we expect that man to love the United States courts? Yet there is nothing in it anywhere that reflects on any United States judge. The United States judge could not help it.

How much do you suppose it cost to serve the summons in that case? A United States marshal or deputy marshal would have to travel across the State, where if the case had been commenced in the court where it ought to have been commenced it would have been only 7 miles. Why, Mr. President, you only have to look at a case to see where the injustice comes. There is nothing fair in that. You can not expect a people, however patriotic, always to submit to that kind of proposition. We can not afford it. Justice is too expensive and life is too short to get it.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, as illustrating the truth of what the Senator has said, in a great many of the States—in my State, for instance—the legislature passed an act prohibiting the transfer of civil cases to Federal courts where the amount in controversy did not exceed $2,000. I have known in my own limited experience of any number of cases, hundreds of them, where litigants having valid claims, as they thought, for amounts much exceeding the $2,000 limit, would bring the suit in a State court for less than $2,000, and take an inadequate compensation for their injuries or wrongs rather than incur the delay and inordinate expense incident to prosecuting the same case in the Federal court.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I also have known that to happen many times; in fact, it is quite a common occurrence. I was not through, however, reading from this document when I was interrupted. I now resume, reading an extract from an address of Lyman Abbott, as follows:

> If ever a time shall come when in this city—

That is, the city of Chicago—

> only the rich man can enjoy law as a doubtful luxury, when the poor who need it most can not have it, when only a golden key will unlock the door to the court room, the seeds of revolution will be sown, the firebrand of revolution will be lighted and put into the hands of men, and they will almost be justified in the revolution which will follow.

This quotation is from a man whose reputation is world-wide. He is known, by reputation, at least, by every Member of this body as one of the greatest writers of America. I suppose if I had used the same language I would have been criticized and denounced by many men and many interests who will remain silent under the statement of so great a man as Doctor Abbott.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. HARRELD. Has it not been the Senator's experience that the position so graphically described by Judge Olson and by Doctor Abbott is brought about equally as well by a congestion of the dockets of the courts?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I will say to the Senator that the crowding of the dockets, such as has been described here by Senators who have argued for this bill, will bring about injustice. I am not claiming that the condition to which I have referred is the only thing which produces injustice.

Mr. HARRELD. In my State there has been more complaint of litigants not being able to have cases tried because of the congested condition of the dockets than there has been about the cost of litigation, though I have heard complaints for both reasons.

Mr. NORRIS. The people in the Senator's State, at least those of them with whom he is acquainted, perhaps, do not feel the need of economy so keenly, because they have more money. They have been digging oil wells and getting rich, and, therefore, they do not care for a few dollars. If wealthy corporations were the only litigants, if they paid all the expenses and there was nothing for the Government to pay, I would not care much how many judges there were.

Mr. HARRELD. On the contrary, the complaint comes mostly from the poor litigants that they can not get their cases tried because of the congested condition of the dockets.

Mr. NORRIS. I said at the beginning that a delay very often meant a denial of justice, and that is the reason I am impressed with a great many of the arguments which have been made for this bill; and yet, as I said in the beginning, after all, it does not reach the fundamental sore; it does not strike at the root of the evil. If we provide now for additional judges, and combinations of wealth continue to develop in the future as they have in the past and litigation increases as it has increased, it will only be a few years until we shall provide for more judges. We will keep on adding to the pyramid, Mr. President, until by its own weight it will topple over, and there will be ruin and devastation in its wake. That is the reason I am afraid of it. I admit that there are many good arguments for the bill, and I am not really attempting to make an argument against it; I am not opposing it; it may be necessary as a temporary remedy. I want to call attention, however, to what to me is a very serious defect in our judicial system, and one which we ought to commence to remedy if we can.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has been referring to distances, and he is indisputably correct that there is an additional expense incident to travel to the place where the Federal court sits, which is usually, of course, at a very much greater distance from the home of the litigant than the place of the sitting of the local State court; but the Senator will remember that the Federal judicial system has been in existence now for 130 years.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And that the expense of travel, at least the time consumed in travel, at the institution of the system was vastly greater than it is now, and that, relatively, the disproportion of which he speaks between the costs in the respective courts has existed ever since the system was established, 130 years ago.

Mr. NORRIS. There are a great many costs now that did not really exist in the primitive days. The kinds of litigation now are very different from what they were then. There is hardly any comparison. For instance, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] yesterday called attention to the condition in his State, and said that the trial of a case there last year required five months. I asked him what kind of a case it was and he was unable to tell me yesterday, but to-day he told me that it was a case involving the validity of a patent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Federal court has always had jurisdiction of such cases.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; but they did not take five months to try one such case. One hundred years ago that would have been an unheard-of thing, while now it is a common thing. I wish to use that instance now, since it has been called to my attention, as the basis for a few remarks, if the Senator will allow me to proceed for a few moments——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me at that point, I want to remark that the reason for that is perfectly obvious. Industry is more complex now than it was 130 years ago.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course; the Senator has stated what I would have been glad to have stated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that the trial of a case involving a patent which was taken out 100 years ago was comparatively a simple matter, as compared with the trial of a case involving a patent which is taken out now.

Mr. NORRIS. It was a very simple matter; but the cost is an important consideration now; so that a poor man has no business to attempt to get a patent. Does the Senator from Montana realize that if he were poor and invented a device, say, an electric light bulb, or something of that kind, which might involve putting out of business a device which was owned by a monopoly like the great Western Electric Co., or some of the other electric companies, though it might be more beneficial to man than almost anything else, he could not get anywhere with it, although the law protects him in his patent? Does he realize that he could not fight those companies and go through the courts? Where would he get the money to hire a lawyer who would spend five months in trying such a case?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I painfully realize that, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. There is absolutely no show for a poor inventor, although the books are full of statutes which in themselves are just.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I could avail myself of some experience in just exactly that line. A client of mine invented the band which is used as a brake now on all automobiles; at least he so claimed. He did not invent it with the purpose of having it apply to automobiles, but it was designed as a brake for wagons. The incident occurred a number of years ago. Instead of the ordinary band brake he invented a brake consisting of a band which was to go about the hub of the wheel of a wagon. He insists—and I have no doubt, correctly—that that invention has been stolen and used as the means of braking automobiles. It is a very valuable invention, but, Mr. President, it would cost him exactly as much to try a case involving that patent in a State court as it would in a Federal court.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The whole state of the art would be exposed by the great corporation which acquired the title if the case were tried in a State court, just exactly the same as if it were tried in a Federal court.

I have had considerable experience in that regard, Mr. President. We used to have very expensive trials in the State court in Montana, involving testimony given by experts touching apex rights, concerning which the Senator from Utah will be able to testify. Exactly the same expense was involved in the State courts so far as the development of the geological features and all that kind of thing was concerned as would have been involved in the Federal courts. So that, so far as patent cases are concerned, the additional expense arises by reason of the vast development of industry and the great complexity of the questions, it seems to me, rather than because the case is tried in a Federal court instead of a State court. I do not see how the same expense in a State court can be avoided except to some little extent in the matter of travel. So the Senator must go deeper; he must find, it seems to me, some other way to relieve litigants of the tremendous costs of which he complains. My client would be no better off if he could try his case in a State court rather than in a Federal court. He was unable to raise the money, and I was unable to raise it for him to carry on the litigation, and, as the Senator has suggested in other cases, he was obliged to abandon whatever claim he had, but he would have been obliged to abandon it if he had prosecuted the case in the State court. He could not raise the money to prosecute it in the State court, and, so far as that is concerned, the difference in expense would have been inconsequential.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, has the Senator concluded?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thought I should like to make that statement.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault with the Senator; I am obliged to him for his suggestion. However, I do not agree with him at all that a patent case can not be tried in a State court for less money than in a Federal court. The illustrations that I have given from my own experience and the other illustrations all show that, perhaps with rare exceptions in a few places—and I do not believe they constitute an exception—it is always more expensive to litigate in a United States court than it is in a State court.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator pardon me further?

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would allow me to proceed for a while now, but I will yield to him if he wants to proceed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was merely desirous of calling attention to the statement made by the Senator from New Jersey that it took 5 weeks or 10 weeks, or whatever the period was, to try in the Federal court in New Jersey the patent case mentioned by him. I undertake to say it would have taken exactly as long a time and would have been just exactly as expensive if the case had been tried in a State court.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to take that case up after awhile when I get through with the general proposition, but I assert that it will cost more to take the same case through a United States court than it will through a State court. I do not believe there is an exception to that rule. If there is, it will be in connection with some peculiar kind of case tried in a city where both State and Federal courts are held and where both litigants reside. In such a situation the expenses might be the same; but the very fact that we have State courts in every county, and there are only two or three places in a State where the Federal court sits, ought to demonstrate that it is many times more expensive to prosecute litigation in the one court than in the other. It costs more to serve the papers; it costs more to hire the lawyers; it costs more for travel; it costs more for witnesses; in fact, everything is more expensive. No sophistry can get around that conclusion, Mr. President, for the facts are standing out here in bold relief. It is no defense to say that in some city where a United States district court sits and where a State court sits, in the county seat, perhaps there may be no difference between the cost involved in prosecuting suits in the State and Federal courts, respectively. I think there will be, for a litigant never fools with the United States court without paying more money than in the case of the State court. I never was able to do it, and I never saw anybody else who was able to do it.

Let us take a patent case. The patent law on the face of it does justice to everybody, and the courts will do justice to you when you get to the right place; but what happens? If you invent a device and secure a patent that conflicts with something owned by a rich man or a large corporation, and you are poor, I will tell you what happens. The rich corporation, absolutely in defiance of the law, pays no attention to your patent, let us say, and commences the manufacture of the article. What are you going to do about it? You commence an injunction suit in the United States district court. That patent may be a difficult, intricate thing. It may be a patent on some chemical process that standing by itself is of no account, but must be used with a dozen or perhaps a hundred other processes in order to get the perfected article, but when so used it would revolutionize the thing thus obtained. Suppose, for illustration, it is that kind of a patent. The big monopoly commences manufacture, as I said, in open defiance of law, and you hire a lawyer—if you can get one without paying a large amount of money, more than you have—to commence a suit for an injunction against this concern. You commence it in the district court of the United States. It may be that they have manufactured the patented article in different parts of the United States. Very likely they have. Somebody will be appointed to take the evidence, and he will travel all over the United States taking it. He will be months taking it, perhaps years taking it. Eventually it will get back to the district court, and there your lawyers will argue whether it is sufficient or not. You have not been able to put up a bond to get a temporary restraining order, because you have not money enough to do it, and they keep right on manufacturing your patented article just the same all the time. When you get to trial you win the case, because you have a good case, you are honest, and they have no standing whatever. The judge decides in your favor.

It may be that somewhere in the taking of the evidence an error has been committed. If so, it has been safely guarded and tucked away. They take it to the court of appeals, and you have to send your lawyer there, and he has to travel to do it. You have had to pay a whole lot of money so far. You have probably lost everything on earth you had by this time, and can not go any farther; and if you have, all the time, perhaps, you have had an offer from the other side that they will pay all the costs and pay your attorney's fee if you will make an assignment of the patent to them. What are you going to do about it? Suppose you do not accept it. You have a little money; you have forty or fifty thousand dollars, but you ought to have a million dollars before you go into that kind of a fight. You go on then to the court of appeals. Perhaps the case is reversed on some technicality; but suppose it is not, but is affirmed. Two or three years have been lost. They are still making the patented article, paying no attention whatever to you. You win the case again.

They take the case to the Supreme Court of the United States. Maybe they find an error somewhere. If they do, the matter goes back for retrial. You travel all over that road again, and it takes two or three more weary years. What happens to you in the meantime? You probably die of old age before you get that far. But suppose you do not. Suppose you have had enough money to go that far and you win the case in the Supreme Court 10 years after the beginning. You have spent $50,000, and what do you get when you get the judgment of the Supreme Court? You get an injunction restraining them from manufacturing this article further. You are entitled to damages—maybe a million dollars, if it is an important patent; maybe $2,000,000, maybe several hundred thousand dollars. You proceed to get it. What do you do?

You have to commence another suit away back in the district court again, and another commissioner is appointed, and he roams all over the United States, wherever that article has been manufactured or sold or dealt in, and gathers evidence; and after two or three years of traveling he gets the evidence together and the case comes before the district court, and there the report of the commissioner is made and the matter is argued again.

Suppose you win that case, and they find there that you are entitled to $500,000 damages, and a judgment is rendered against them. What next? The same weary road—on up to the Supreme Court, and before the matter is finally decided maybe you have had to go up there three or four times. If errors have ever been committed, the case goes back for a retrial; but eventually, Mr. President, while you may have started out early in life, you finally, like Jarndyce against Jarndyce, reach the Supreme Court for the last time, and you are old, decrepit, gray-haired, ready to die, and get a final adjudication of your judgment. The chances are ninety-nine to one that you never will get that far. You can not get that far unless you are wealthy. The poor man will stop; the poor man will die somewhere on that road that he is traveling.

In a very important hearing a year or two ago before the Patent Committee some of the greatest patent lawyers in the United States were present to testify, and one of the greatest was on the stand making an argument when I put this question to him myself:

> Suppose a poor man does invent some important thing and gets it patented under the law, and, for the purpose of the argument, let us assume that there is not any question about the legality of the patent, and a great, rich corporation absolutely ignores it and defies it and goes ahead; and suppose that poor man came to you. What advice would you give him?

He was very honest, very frank, and told just what he would do, and he told the right thing; there is no question about it. He said:

> I would tell the man to sell out at the very best figure he could get. There is no hope for him.

I am not claiming that this will give full relief in a case of that kind. We could change that by changing the patent law. I am not claiming that this would give relief, but it would cheapen the matter a great deal. This five months' time in this court in New Jersey, I have no doubt, was not taken up by the judge, but it was taken up by the referees who were taking evidence, maybe traveling around in other States getting evidence. The case was perhaps pending that long; it perhaps needed an attorney every day in court somewhere for five months, but not before the United States court.

Mr. President, there is no doubt but that the most expensive place to litigate in the United States is in the United States courts. That can not be gainsaid; and justice is not any better there than it is in the State courts—not a particle.

Mr. President, I have gone over the fact that we have a duplicate system. That is very expensive. That is not efficiency. We have the most inefficient system in the world. We could hardly make it worse unless we should make it triplicate instead of duplicate. I do not know how the system can be defended on fundamental principles. Nobody claims now that justice can not be obtained before a judge because he happens to be a State judge. One of the fundamental principles which have come down in the common law is that a man charged with a crime must be tried by a jury of his peers; that no man can be hauled away from the place where the thing happened, or is alleged to have happened, and be tried in a strange land. That has been sacred in the common law. We adhere to it yet. We claim it as one of the stand-bys of human liberty. Why does it not apply to a judge? Not so much, I will admit. Why should not the same thing in a degree, at least, apply to a judge? How can we be consistent, Mr. President, if we say you will have to submit to the verdict of a jury of your peers in the locality where the crime is alleged to have been committed, but you can be tried by a judge who has come 5,000 miles to try you? That is what this bill allows. That is what our United States courts allow. They can not help it.

The Federal judges are not familiar with local conditions as the State judges are. They are not responsive to the pulsations of humanity. They are held aloof by their positions, holding them for life as they do. Without charging, without even thinking of any individual, when you take the ordinary men, the able men of a community, and give them positions for life at a large salary, while I do not believe that all of them will be affected, while I am not claiming that half of them will be affected, I do know and we all know and God knows that many of them will be affected; that the security of a life position and a life salary makes them forget too often the toiling masses who are struggling for an existence. Thus we have another prejudice, either right or wrong, that has grown up against the Federal courts, and it is getting to be a common thing now.

One of the principal uses of the Federal judge is to have him issue injunctions. Some time ago the Federal Trade Commission, I understand, undertook to investigate the United States Steel Trust. They were promptly met with an injunction restraining them from considering it. They undertook, I understand—I am not familiar with the facts—to investigate the anthracite coal business or, anyway, some coal business, and were met with an injunction restraining them from going into it on the ground that the operation of coal mines was not an interstate business, and hence they had no jurisdiction. I am informed that at the same time, in one of our States where there is a good deal of coal mined, an action was commenced by a similar commission, holding its authority from that State, and they were met by a Federal injunction restraining them from going on with that investigation on the ground that the coal business was interstate. So they catch us coming and going. You can take your choice, you who are paying fabulous prices for coal and are perhaps doomed not long hence to pay increased prices. Some Federal judge somewhere will probably grant an injunction, whenever it is necessary, restraining a Federal commission, the Federal Trade Commission, for instance, from investigating and from publishing the facts.

Not long ago, I am informed, the United States Railroad Labor Board, provided for in the Esch-Cummins law, had a hearing on a complaint of some kind of a dispute between the Pennsylvania Railroad and its employees, and it was about to decide the case against the Pennsylvania Railroad when they were promptly met with an injunction restraining them from rendering a decision.

Mr. President, I do not believe such decrees, which I conceive to be unreasonable and destructive of good government, could be obtained in State courts. Some judge who has been influenced by a life tenure may, with perfect honesty, as he views the situation, grant such an injunction, but no Federal judge ought to have a right to grant an injunction against another Federal authority from performing a duty laid down by law.

I read from a paper called "Labor," of date February 25, 1922, in which it is said, only reading part of the article:

> In the meantime the 24-hour injunction granted by Judge Landis on December 9 is extended with each postponement and the labor board is restrained from handing down a decision originally intended to be made public on December 12 finding the Pennsylvania Railroad guilty of disregarding decisions of the labor board and violating the transportation act, all of which permits the carrier to continue defiance of the law in a "legal" manner.

Mr. President, if the judges of the United States courts would take less time in trying to issue injunctions restraining other public officials from performing their duty, they would have more time to clear these congested dockets and try these cases which are pending in the United States courts.

This same paper describes a condition which has occurred down in Alabama.

Mr. STERLING. What is the date of issue?

Mr. NORRIS. It is the issue of February 25, 1922. I do not know whether that injunction against the Federal Railroad Labor Board is still kept alive or not. I never heard of the board rendering its decision. But the idea of Congress passing a law providing for the establishment of a board to do certain things, and when they have hearings and decide the case the party that finds out it is going to be beaten in the hearing after the trial slipping over into court and getting an injunction restraining the board from handing down its decision. We can not be surprised if there is prejudice amongst the common people against United States judges.

In the same paper from which I read before there appears this article:

> On February 15 agents of the United States marshal, without legal warrant and in the most outrageous manner, invaded the offices of the joint strike committee and carried away books and documents, many of which had nothing whatever to do with the conduct of the strike, and are holding them while Buggs—

He was the receiver of a railroad down there—> and other representatives of the railroad are making photographic copies to be used by private interests in their fight against striking employees.

That has been righted since, I think. The court has set it aside. But this describes how they got a subpœna, got the men in the office out of the way, and while they were gone got another subpœna duces tecum to get the documents, so as to photograph them and copy them, something which had nothing to do with the litigation which was pending. They wanted to fortify themselves against a labor union and used the United States court officers as instrumentalities by which they could get a record.

When I read that, Mr. President, I remembered most vividly that when the Federal Trade Commission was trying to investigate the packers in Chicago, when they sent over to the packers' offices and tried to get their letters, they were met with an injunction of the United States court compelling them, before they could get any letter or anything they had, to specify in the subpœna just what they wanted. They had to tell what it was they wanted, and they were restrained from going at large over the office and looking through the files.

So the injunction of the United States court, which holds the great meat monopoly in Chicago blameless, restrained the commission from obtaining any evidence against the monopoly without specifying just exactly what it wanted. So an injunction of another Federal court down in Alabama seems to favor a railroad company against a labor union. The same law that protects the packer in Chicago ought to protect the most humble laboring man in the union.

As I understand it, later on in this case down in Alabama the judge, when there was brought to his notice what had been done by the officials of the court, repudiated it, brought them into court, made them surrender everything they had taken, and destroyed all the photographs and copies; so again it was no fault of the judge himself.

Mr. President, when courts are operated hundreds of miles away from the people who are affected by their action you can not expect the same faith, the same confidence—no, nor the same justice—you would get from a court which operates in a community where the people affected live. That is the reason I think we ought to abolish United States courts and give all their jurisdiction to State courts.

There is a provision in this bill which seems to me to be injurious, and that is the roving provision, sending the judges around, bringing all senior judges here to Washington every year at the expense of the taxpayers. If we get justice at the end of this circuitous business, if at the end of Jarndyce against Jarndyce justice is dealt out, the people to whom justice ought to be given are dead before it reaches them.

I think there are some provisions in this bill which ought to be adopted, because there are some places where there ought to be more judges until we get the permanent remedy which I think would give permanent relief. But there is a provision in the bill providing for the senior circuit judges coming to Washington, and, with the Chief Justice of the United States, going over the judicial situation in the United States, reviewing it, talking about it, and I suppose agreeing on a plan for the next year.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I hope at least that the Senator from Nebraska will consider what I believe to be the underlying reason or motive for that provision. It is for the purpose of expediting business in the Federal courts.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that.

Mr. STERLING. And it would be of relief to the people, the taxpayers, and to the litigants.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that is the object and the purpose of it, and the purpose of our whole United States judicial system was a noble one, as laid down by our forefathers, but when we come to put it in practical operation we find it does not work out right. It is duplicating, at an enormous expense, the State systems. I am not saying this was put in with any ulterior motive; I am not charging that by any means. The theory is beautiful, but I do not believe it will work in practice.

When these judges come to Washington at the expense of the taxpayers, I was about to say, what will they do? They will meet with the Chief Justice. They will be dined every evening somewhere. They will be run to death with social activities. They will be killed with social favoritisms before they get down to business. That is especially true in respect to the genial Chief Justice we have, who dines out somewhere every night. I would like to pause right here to say, Mr. President, that I do not believe there is any man who can stick his legs under the tables of the idle rich every night and be fit the next day to sit in judgment upon those who toil. Honest though he may be, he can not get away from the atmosphere that will surround him, and ninety-nine times out of one hundred it will affect him and get him in the end.

There will come a time, if this is continued, when dinners will not be as fashionable or as enticing, when there will be people here in the Capital City who will not be dining out in high social fashion every night, and when they do go to social and friendly dinners you will find women there who wear dresses that come clear up over their shoulders and extend downward below the knees. When that time comes, Mr. President, even William Howard Taft would not accept an invitation to that kind of a dinner.

Mr. President, I do not believe there can be any doubt but what in the practical workings the annual pilgrimages these judges will make to Washington will have an unfavorable effect upon them and upon the common idea of the common folks as to the courts. We have to bear that in mind all the way through. It is demonstrated now that justice is too expensive. It is demonstrated by the testimony on all sides that the poor man has to pay too much to get justice, and when we add any more to the expense and to the other influences outside of the duties which ordinarily devolve upon judges, we further weaken the system. No man will be injured, no interest will be hurt, by the abolishment of the United States courts and the conferring of their jurisdiction upon the State courts.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, without any preliminary remarks upon the subject I want to place before the Senate the business transacted in the Federal courts of New Jersey and compare it with some of the other districts where the Senate has held, both in the Committee on the Judiciary and upon the floor of the Senate, that additional judges are not required.

In my opinion, there is absolutely no demand and no necessity for an additional judge in the district of the State of New Jersey. They have three judges there, one of the judgeships created, I understand, not later than 1916. In addition to that, the judge of the United States circuit court lives in the State of New Jersey and has ample leisure to devote much of his time to district business. The third circuit is composed of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, and there is no great amount of business in the circuit court. The statistics given in the Attorney General's report show that in the third circuit the cases determined in the fiscal year 1920–21 were 124 and that there were 98 cases remaining on the docket for three judges to dispose of. Delaware has practically no business. The principal business is in the States of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Practically there are four judges already there who can be reached to transact whatever business there may be.

We have seen by statements made on the floor which can not be controverted that bankruptcy cases and draft cases can not be considered in a statement of the business pending in the courts. That was recognized by the Attorney General in his annual report and it was recognized by all the gentlemen who appeared before the committee while considering the bill. Those cases should, therefore, be eliminated.

Eliminating those cases, there were pending on the docket of the New Jersey Federal court on the 30th of June last 1,860 cases. With three district judges to try them, that would mean 620 cases each. If the circuit judge would give any of his time to the trial of cases, there would only be 465 cases each pending at the close of the year.

I wish to direct the attention of Senators to this fact, and every lawyer will recognize it at once. When we enumerate the cases pending on the docket of any court, it does not mean that they are all there ready for trial. Some of them may have been there for some time and are yet unprepared. Some of them may have just been filed that same day. Some of them may have been brought 30 days previously, and the return of the summons just made or even not yet made. Some of them may be just at issue, and in the usual course of procedure and practice of the court can not be tried for six months or until the next term or the second subsequent term of the court. Every lawyer, I think, will agree with me that of the cases nominally upon the dockets there are at least 25 to 33 per cent of them not then ready for trial and not then really pending. Do I place it too high?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think so.

Mr. SHIELDS. So a statement of pending cases does not give any clear idea of the congestion of the docket. While there are 1,860 cases pending in New Jersey, I should say that at least 500 of them could be stricken off as not ready for trial and not really pending in the sense of producing a congestion. But grant that they are pending; if three judges work, there are only 620 cases each, and they can all sit at the same time. With the assistance of the circuit judge in that State there are only 465 cases each.

Another consideration is that many of the cases which have just been brought or the indictments just found perhaps will go off the docket without a trial and without consuming any substantial amount of the time of the court. The statistics of the Federal courts of all cases disposed of in the year show that more than half of them are dismissed, discontinued, go off on demurrers sustained, or, in the case of criminal cases, about four-fifths of them go off on pleas of guilty, taking no time whatever of the court.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. I would like to ask the Senator if it is not true also that the causes of a good many of these cases will be removed as we get further away from the war?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will answer that question upon the evidence of the three district judges who made the report to the Attorney General and the evidence of the Attorney General himself. The Attorney General himself said the peak of criminal cases growing out of prohibition and the war had been reached and he thought there would be a decline. They all admitted that the alleged congestion in the courts is temporary to a large extent, although the Attorney General stated that on account of increased population—and it has not been very enormous in the country in the last 10 years—and the increase in business, and so on, there would be some increase on the civil side of the docket; and I think he is correct about that. Generally speaking, that is true.

Let us come down now to what the three New Jersey judges did in the year 1920–21, as appears from the Attorney General's report. The civil cases they tried numbered 109. Deducting those dismissed, they tried only 109 civil cases. Of the criminal cases, there were 478, after deducting the draft cases, and of those there were pleas of not guilty and dismissed on demurrer 426, so they actually tried only 52 criminal cases in that State in that year. I have been referring only to United States cases. There were other civil cases to which the United States was not a party, of which they tried 480, making a total of 641 cases that were tried in that year by those three judges, with the assistance of a circuit judge, or, if we take the district judges only, there were 214 cases each. If we add the circuit judge, there were very many less cases tried per judge.

I referred to the fact that the adjoining State is Delaware, which has a district judge with comparatively no business to transact. There is an oportunity for assistance from that source. The circuit judge of that circuit can assign the Delaware judge to New Jersey under the present statute. He can be designated to go there and hold court, so there is that extra judge, which would make five judges available to try this comparatively small number of cases on the New Jersey docket.

As to the fact that these cases are not very much litigated, the Attorney General's report shows that only 50 of them were tried by juries. Everyone knows that outside of a certain character of equity cases it is the jury cases which consume the time of a court.

That statement is a little startling after the lurid statements from judges and lawyers which the Senator from New Jersey read, but it will be noted that in these very glowing statements with reference to the congestion and business in that State they never gave any statistics; they never told of the number of cases pending or decided by the court.

They dwelt at length upon the great prosperity, especially in the manufacture of corporations in New Jersey, and showed ample ground for litigation, and a fertile field for litigation; but when we look at the Attorney General's report it will be seen that that soil was not cultivated much and produced a very small crop of cases, and that the three judges there were trying a very small number of cases, perhaps less than any other district judge east of the Mississippi River. The fact is, if we take the figures and statistics reported by the Attorney General, there is less excuse for an additional judge in New Jersey than in any other State that has been suggested here.

I want to compare that just a little with my own State, where the committee denied an additional judge. There are two districts over which Judge Edward P. Sanford presides, and, as I have had occasion to remark on more than one day when discussing this measure, he is a comparatively young man, in the full vigor of life, able and industrious, a good lawyer, and a good judge. No one questions that he devotes all the time that he should to holding court in the two districts. In those two districts combined in the year 1920-21 he tried 561 cases. At the end of the year, when this estimate was made, the cases pending similar to those on the New Jersey docket were 921 in number.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him to what district he refers now?

Mr. SHIELDS. I am referring to the middle and eastern districts of Tennessee. I am putting them together, because that is the work one judge is doing in Tennessee.

We saw that there were 50 jury cases tried in the State of New Jersey by all three of those judges, with the assistance of the circuit judge. Judge Sanford tried 177 jury cases during that same year. So we can see what he was able to do. He is a good judge, but he has no preeminence over others. I believe if others were just as industrious as he, they could try the same number of cases. Generally the men who have been appointed to these positions are men of ability and able to do the work.

I will just refer briefly to Florida. There they had only one judge. There were tried in that year, 1920-21, by the judge of the southern district of Florida 539 cases, and 97 of them were jury cases.

There were pending on his docket nominally 1,254 cases at the same time 1,800 cases were pending on the docket of the three judges in New Jersey, aided by a circuit judge. The Judiciary Committee and the Senate have said that there was no necessity in Florida for an additional judge; and yet in Florida one judge is doing practically as much as three judges in New Jersey, although they are assisted by a circuit judge, with Delaware available to help them out. The case of New Jersey is absolutely without merit.

In the mountains of eastern Tennessee there used to be current among the lawyers an expression, referring to a case that had no merit, that it was an absolutely "sleeveless case." I do not know how generally that expression is used, but in my opinion it applies to the character of case presented by the Senator from New Jersey. It does not appear that the Senator from New Jersey ever offered his amendment until after the bill was reported. No special bill was ever introduced to provide an additional judge, as there was in the case of Tennessee and in the case of Florida.

If the facts are as I have stated, the conclusion is inevitable that there is no necessity of onerating the people of the country with an additional judge for New Jersey. I do not care to dwell upon that subject further.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is it not conceded on all hands that while the number of cases pending untried may be significant, it is by no means conclusive of the work done or the work necessary to be done? May we not admit, does not the learned Senator from Tennessee admit, that the number of cases remaining on the docket at the end of a given year, while informing and more or less significant, is not indicative or conclusive of the labor performed? Do we not know from experience that an energetic, capable, learned, conscientious judge may take a week or a month to try a given case, and thereafter dispose of a dozen small cases in a day? With great and unfeigned respect for the Senator from Tennessee, to repeat, I ask him, are we to attach the greatest importance to the mere number of cases disposed of? Should we not know the nature of the cases and inquire as to the character of the judges who perform their duties in the several districts throughout the country?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will answer the Senator's questions, and I will answer the last question first. I have been presuming that all of the judges are honest; that they are all capable; and that they are all discharging their duties. The Senator from California says that we must inquire into the character of the judges. If my statement be not correct, if the judges are not discharging their duties, the remedy for any particular district is not a new judge but the removal of the judge who is not doing his duty but is holding a public office as a sinecure, drawing money from the Public Treasury without consideration.

Now, as to the number of cases tried during a given year in one district and the number pending on the docket at any particular period being indicative of the business of the district, I say it is indicative. It is very strong evidence as to what work the judge has to do and has done. As to whether it is conclusive or not, I say it is not; there are other facts that may be considered; but the best evidence we have as to congestion is that which has been furnished us by the Attorney General and by the commission selected by him to examine into all these matters, by his two assistants who appeared before us, and by the Chief Justice, who came before the committee to testify.

Of course, the Chief Justice did not undertake to give statistics, but only made a general statement. That is all he did and it is all he can ever do. No one man in the United States sitting here in Washington, presiding over the greatest court in the world, the duties of which ought to consume his entire time, can through the senior circuit judges, after consulting with them in a week's conference in the manner described by the Senator from Nebraska, possibly learn what is to be done in the various districts. In human nature that would be impossible.

The Senator from California, I believe, lives in the northern district of California. I do not know whether or not he practiced in the southern district of California; but I doubt whether he has very accurate information of what is going on in the southern district of his State. I am not now practicing law in Tennessee, but when I was practicing law and living in the eastern district of Tennessee I had very little idea of the business on the docket of the court in the western district of Tennessee, 500 miles away from me. So the evidence which has been furnished us is the best evidence we have in reference to the manner in which business is handled in the various courts.

Every lawyer knows that in States similarly situated the litigation is along similar lines. Men and women are much alike everywhere, socially, economically, and in their litigious inclinations, although I know some people are more litigious than others. In the section of Tennessee in which I live, the mountain section, the people are more litigious and the court has a bigger docket than in the other section, though it is the smallest, I believe, in area. The east Tennesseeans like a fight. There were more of them in the Army than from any similar area in the United States. They love a lawsuit better than do any people in the world. They begin a lawsuit in the lower courts and never end until the last court has a say about it.

To refer to the case of Florida, the district court there has as many admiralty cases as has the district court in New Jersey. The statistics so show. Florida is developing rapidly, and many big lawsuits come before the courts there. In Tennessee big ejectment suits come before the courts, involving coal lands and iron lands, embracing all the way from 1,000 to 100,000 acres, sometimes valued at millions of dollars.

Under our land system in Tennessee titles are purely artificial, the State having been formed from territory ceded by North Carolina; and I defy any man from another State, who has not been raised in Tennessee, to go down there and understand the land system in a year or to conduct an ejectment suit.

A suit of that character is more difficult than a corporation suit or an admiralty suit or any other kind of suit, and it requires much time.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from California does he believe that a judge who only tries 170 cases a year on the average is doing all he can do?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can not answer that without knowing the nature of the cases being tried. There are many cases—civil and criminal, admiralty causes, causes involving patent rights, causes involving interstate commerce laws—which might take up the time of the most industrious and learned judge for weeks.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly those cases are about the same all over the United States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That may or may not be so. But answering the Senator's question, I would not arbitrarily say, in considering whether a judge was good or bad, that the number of cases tried by him was conclusive, even though he tried but 107 cases or 117.

While I am on my feet, without wishing to break in on the Senator unduly, I would rely upon the matured judgment, deliberately delivered, of the Senator from Tennessee as to the present necessity of an additional judge for the middle district of Tennessee, and I hope it will not be regarded as offensive if I remind the Senator that hitherto he has thought that there was need of an additional judge for the middle district of Tennessee. I do not mention that to embarrass the Senator, for I would not embarrass him.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is nothing the Senator could say on that subject that would embarrass me, either as to the courts or the country or the people of eastern Tennessee.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly not. I have relatives in eastern Tennessee who bear my name, and they are fairly good people.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I can shorten the controversy. I absolutely, of my personal knowledge, do not know anything in the world about it. I have been in the Senate for nine years; I have never been in those courts, except casually. I venture to say that every other Senator here is in the same situation practically, although the Senator from California has not been away from the courts of his State so long. However, the best evidence before the committee, in fact, as I remember, the only evidence, that additional judges ought to be provided for California is found in the facts I have been stating as to the number of cases the judges tried and the number of cases pending on their dockets. Those facts, as in the case of every other district, are before us. There is no special evidence of any consequence except the lurid statement of some fellow—I will not use the word "fellow" and I do not want to make the statement too strong, but while there is a vacancy there is always hope of filling it, and as to some judges who are not trying many cases it looks to me as if they want some relief.

I do not attack the integrity of the judges. I never did that in my life; I never did it prior to the time when I was on the bench; I never did it on account of politics. My State is peculiar. I have practiced in that State before circuit judges and criminal judges and chancellors who were all Republicans. I have tried political suits in which I represented Democrats against lawyers representing Republicans, but I never suspected the integrity of one of those judges or that he was biased on account of politics or corrupt on any other account. The ticket for the supreme court and for the intermediate appeals court runs all over the State. The State is and ought to be Democratic, and while it slipped a cog at the last election it will never be done again, in my judgment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not want to sit silent and admit that the Senator is a prophet.

Mr. SHIELDS. There are Democratic judges in that State also, and I have never suspected one of them, and no Republican lawyer in Tennessee does. I have the utmost confidence in the integrity and purity of the judiciary, and my contest in this case and my efforts here have been to sustain the judicial integrity and purity. I yield the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask whether any other Senator is ready at this time to speak upon this bill or upon any amendment connected with it?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I was going to suggest that from the observation made by the Senator from Iowa it was apparent that we might be recessing or adjourning. It seems to me that we ought to proceed, because we must vote at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. At 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. ASHURST. I think we ought to go right along with the bill for another hour.

Mr. CUMMINS. My judgment is that before we could get a quorum the time would have come to adjourn, and I had it in my mind to move a recess, after an executive session, until 11 o'clock to-morrow. The Senator from Arizona knows how difficult it is to get a quorum at this hour in the afternoon.

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, I have no idea of making a point of no quorum. I probably shall do that which will drive out a quorum; I want to make a short speech, lasting three or four minutes.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator wants to speak upon the bill, of course I shall not make any motion.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Tennessee a question? I desire to know if the Judiciary Committee gave any attention to the suggestion of increasing the number of United States commissioners rather than increasing the number of judges? The judge of the district court of Boston, in addressing the bar association a short time ago, thought the congestion in the courts could be relieved very much by increasing the number of commissioners and increasing their jurisdiction, rather than by increasing the number of judges. Has the Judiciary Committee considered that aspect of the question?

Mr. SHIELDS. That was discussed in the committee; but while the committee really came to no definite conclusion in the way of a vote upon the subject, I think the majority of the opinion was that under the Constitution commissioners could not be vested with sufficient power. There was a difference in the committee upon the subject; but, as I say, I think the majority were of the opinion that such a remedy was not available.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from Montana, also.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the opinion expressed by the Senator from Tennessee was universally entertained in the committee, that the judicial power could not be vested in commissions; that is to say, they could not be empowered to act the part of judges. It was suggested, however, that a very great relief could be accorded in substantially the same way—that is to say, by appointing what might be spoken of as auxiliary or deputy judges, given the power to try these comparatively trivial cases which come before the Federal courts and are generally referred to as police court business. For myself, I think it exceedingly unfortunate that these Federal judges, judges of the district courts, should be required to spend their time trying cases that in the ordinary jurisprudence would go for adjudication before some inferior tribunal, acting generally in a summary way.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator's statement is in line with the opinion of the justice to whom I have referred.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. Such judges, however, would be United States judges. They would be appointed, as a matter of course, for life, just the same as the existing district judges. I should see no particular objection to that, however, because really the clerks of the district courts are practically appointed for life, because a judge having once appointed his clerk, he continues in office so long as the judge does, as a rule, and the judge remaining for life, the clerk remains for life. So I do not see that there would be any particular objection on the ground that these inferior judges would have a life tenure, just the same as the judges of greater dignity; but the Chief Justice seems to regard the suggestion with very little favor, and I am inclined to think that perhaps his opinion was somewhat influential with the committee. I spoke as apparently does the Senator from New Jersey about the matter because I received a letter from a very distinguished judge out West who expressed exactly the same view, that the situation would be greatly relieved if some system could be devised by the granting of jurisdiction to commissioners, as he expressed it, or to some other judges, judges of inferior grade, who would handle this police court business.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the increase in business been largely of a trivial character, similar to police-court business?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the hearings before the committee rather tended to dissipate the public opinion that the congestion complained of is very largely due to the Volstead Act and other prohibition legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That seems to be the popular opinion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly it has contributed very much to the aggregate of the business of these courts; but in the deliberations of the committee and in the assignment of judges as they are assigned by this bill practically no attention whatever was paid to the prohibition cases. The judgment of the committee, I think, in every instance, either in rejecting or in granting an additional judge, was based upon the business outside of the prohibition cases. I think the Senator in charge of the bill will confirm that view; but, notwithstanding that, there is a vast amount of business of that character which could as well be disposed of by judges of the caliber of the ordinary municipal judge, and, in my opinion, with substantial justice at, I think, a very much reduced cost to the Government of the United States, thus enabling the district judge to give his attention to more important matters.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator from Montana if he has expressed an opinion about the provision of this bill that provides for the transfer of judges from jurisdiction to jurisdiction?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I intend to say something about that when I discuss the bill, as I propose to do briefly to-morrow morning.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 6, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Holy Spirit, Thou dost bless us with the countless mercies of life, and we thank Thee for the promise that the rest of the way need not be made alone. We offer Thee the unspoken praise of our hearts. We seek that calmness of soul that accepts problems and hardships which stir our best energies. Abide with us, dear Lord, that they may unfold into the fruits of righteousness, wisdom, and happiness. Refine our faculties, increase their capacity, and give them unity and direction. We would have our principles alive with splendid zeal. Under the ministry of Thy Spirit may they reaffirm themselves in unselfish and unwearied service for our Republic. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yesterday afternoon the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] rose to a question of privilege, but it was held by the Chair not to be a question of privilege on the ground that the matter did not present a question of privilege, and the gentleman from Texas asked unanimous consent that he might proceed briefly, stating that it was a matter affecting the entire House. Objection was made, but I have reason to think that that objection would not be pressed, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, is this a matter that he spoke on yesterday?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes at the conclusion of my colleague's address.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asks unanimous consent at the conclusion of the address of his colleague to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, during my entire career in Congress I have never yet said on the outside behind their backs anything about the House or any of my colleagues which I had not theretofore already said on this floor face to face in your presence.

On January 12, 1922, from this floor I made a speech against some of the perquisites of Congressmen. I made it in your presence face to face. A few days previous I had fought against the Ireland resolution passed by this House paying all losses of our restaurants in the Capitol and House Office Building out of the Treasury. As usual, I was ridiculed by a Member. The lady from Oklahoma claimed that I favored using one roller towel a week for a family. My speech from this floor on January 12, 1922, showed just what is furnished to Congressmen and the perquisites we enjoy. In my speech at Austin, Tex., I made just such statements as I had made on this floor.

Yet in attempting to quote me in last Sunday's issue the New York World garbled facts with fiction.

I did not say that Congressmen are shaved free. I said that our barbers have their barber shops, furniture, fixtures, lights, heat, water (hot and cold), towels, and such things furnished to them free, paid for by the Government, and in addition were paid salaries of $70 per month out of the Treasury, and that we paid them 25 cents for haircuts, when double and treble this fee is charged in commercial shops. I said the body rubbers in our bathrooms were paid $95 and $78 per month, respectively, out of the Treasury, and that it should stop.

I said that in our splendid offices we are supplied with a secretary and clerk, at an expense of $3,200 per annum, with $480 bonus added; that we are supplied with the finest furniture and carpets, two typewriting machines, comb and brush, clothes brush, soap, hot and cold water, electric fans, and clean linen towels every day. I did not say that the rug on my office floor cost $500. I said that the carpets and rugs in some of the large suites of committee chairmen cost $500. And if you will look on page 363 of our Clerk's last report you will see that the rugs and carpets for the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee rooms cost the Government $1,124.80. And on page 368 you will see that for the carpet on this floor our Government paid $10,078. And on page 366 you will see that for each Wilton rug that goes into our ordinary offices the Government last paid $191.75 each. In stores they would cost citizens much more.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment.

I did not say that the Government supplies each Congressman with a whisky flask, a poker set, pocketknives, and so forth. What I said was that in the Sixty-fifth Congress each Member had credited to his account in the stationery room $375, and in the Sixty-sixth Congress each Member had credited to him $375, and in the present Congress each Member has had credited to him already, since April 1 last year, $250, and will have another $125 credited to him there on December 1, ostensibly to buy stationery, and that we are permitted to draw this out in cash, if we want to, or we are permitted to buy anything kept in the House stationery room and have it charged against our stationery accounts. I said that these employees in the House stationery room are paid out of the Treasury to wait on us. I said that there is kept there for sale, and I exhibited on this floor the articles I procured for the purpose from said stationery room—whisky flasks covered with ostrich skin leather; ladies' fine bags covered with ostrich skin leather, worth wholesale $22.40; fine leather-covered poker sets, playing cards by the dozen; ladies fine manicure sets, all pearl covered, worth wholesale, $26——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment.

Sets of carving knives, forks, and steels, copper chafing dishes, worth wholesale $15; pearl-handled pocketknives, worth wholesale $8; and large hunting knives. I showed that any Member could buy these things, if he desired, and have them charged against his $375 credit for each Congress of three sessions. And I said then, and I say now, that it should be stopped.

I did not say that each Member receives $2,100 mileage. What I did say was that in the Sixty-fifth and the Sixty-sixth Congresses, the mileage paid to the Texas Members would average $2,100 for each of these Congresses, and that it would average $2,100 for this Congress to each Texas Member. As a matter of fact, it averages $2,191.44 to Texas Members. Where there are three sessions to a Congress, as in the Sixty-fifth, the Sixty-sixth, and the present Sixty-seventh Congress, each one of us Texas Members gets three mileage checks per Congress, and each of these checks average $730.48. To show exactly what each of these three mileage checks amounts to, I quote from the Sergeant at Arms' books the following:

Amount of each mileage check issued to Texas Members.

Hatton W. Sumners	$707.20
Marvin Jones	736.00
Clay Briggs	702.80
Sam Rayburn	673.20
Harry Wurzbach	783.60
John N. Garner	851.20
Eugene Black	514.00
Daniel E. Garrett	602.40
C. B. Hudspeth	934.00
J. J. Mansfield	840.00
John C. Box	646.40
Tom Connally	740.80
Rufus Hardy	729.20
Thomas L. Blanton	717.20
Morgan G. Sanders	700.00
James P. Buchanan	840.00
Lucian Parrish	733.48
Fritz Lanham	697.20
Total	13,148.68

The above total divided by 18 shows that the mileage paid Texas Members averages $730.48 for each of the three sessions of Congress, or an average of $2,191.44 per Texas Member per each Congress.

Of course Members living in different parts received different amounts. The majority leader, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] receives $766 per session, or $2,298 per Congress, while the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] receives $386 per session, or $1,158 per Congress, and the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] receives $1,453.20 per session, or $4,359.60 mileage per Congress. And I called attention to the fact that there are over 60 bachelors in Congress, and that we all get mileage whether we ride trains or not, and that this overpayment of unnecessary mileage should be stopped.

I called attention to the fact that after I knocked out on a point of order and kept us from getting last year our usual cedar chest, pine chest, and oak chest, when a few weeks ago I again had a point of order sustained against same a majority of you supported an appeal from the decision of the Chair and put these items back into the bill. And none of you can defend successfully our receiving cedar chests paid for out of the Treasury.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. I have just a few matters more. Then I will yield.

Though you may not believe it, I am working for the best interests of every Member in Congress. We can not defend these little, measly items of petty graft. I have seen some of the biggest, most important men in this House defeated at the polls and left at home. And unless we put an end to all this foolishness, sooner or later each one of us will be left at home, for our people are going to hold us individually responsible for same.

In my speech at Austin, Tex., I told my big audience there, and also at Houston, and also at Denison, that the great majority of you are just as much against all of these little items of graft as I am, but you have learned that if you ever oppose any of such items you are immediately called a hypocrite and a demagogue, and you take the path of least resistance and say nothing. Why, a distinguished Member told me yesterday that if I kept up my fight my colleagues would all dislike me. If that is true, I am ready to accept their dislike. If I can not criticize the things I find here that I think should be stopped in the interest of the people without my colleagues disliking me, then I must accept your dislike. For I came here to serve not you, my colleagues, but my 314,000 confiding constituents in Texas. My first concern is their interest. And if representing their interest loses me the friendship of every colleague here I am ready to lose it. But you are not that kind of men. And I want your friendship. But I want it only if you are willing to give it, notwithstanding my fights for what I believe is right. [Applause.]

Now I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman has referred to these matters as "graft."

Mr. BLANTON. I was only saying what the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] said they were.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Among other things, the gentleman refers to the stationery account. Of course, I suppose the public generally understands that there is under the law allotted to each Member during a session of Congress $125 for stationery?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, may I ask the gentleman a question somewhat personal?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has there been a session of Congress at which the gentleman himself has not expended that much or more for stationery?

Mr. BLANTON. Not for stationery alone, because I bought various articles.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That comes within the legitimate scope of stationery.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, for instance, I bought a typewriter, an extra one, that I needed, which is my property. It belongs to me.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You did not buy it out of the $375?

Mr. BLANTON. I bought it out of the $375 that is allowed me per Congress. I can take that typewriter home with me when I go.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did the gentleman in his address in Texas state this matter in a manner to leave upon the audience which he was addressing the fair impression that Members were expending their stationery allowance for things other than stationery and outside of the limit of the law?

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad the gentleman asked me that question. I stated at Austin just exactly what I said on this floor on January 12, 1922, in your presence; exactly that, and no more. I left no impression there that I did not make in the RECORD and in my speech here to-day, that a Member, if he wants to, can take it all out in cash if he can get along with a little stationery. As a matter of fact, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee knows that each of the committees furnishes us with a good deal of stationery, our own committees.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know how it is with the gentleman, but since I have asked the question of the gentleman himself, I will say for myself that year in and year out there has never been a year in which the allowance for stationery alone meets my requirements.

Mr. BLANTON. That may be true; but I want to ask the gentleman this: If we spend it all for stationery, why is it necessary to keep all these items in that stationery room for sale at wholesale prices to Members? The manager of the stationery room told me that the wife of a Member of the House had come to him one day and asked him to buy a ton of coal for her. He told me that another Member's wife had come to him and asked him to have her shoes half-soled and charged to her husband's stationery account. I say that is a matter that we can not defend before our own people. We ought to stop it and stand on this floor and not be afraid of the gaff of the Members. That is what I have got to stand. But I can stand it. I have stood it all my life, and I am not afraid of the gaff. I have stood more than that in my life, and I am not afraid of the gaff that always follows such a fight.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the gentleman did not leave the impression upon his Texas auditors, nor does he intend to leave the impression here, that the stock which is now in the stationery room is costing the Government anything?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, if the gentleman will figure up what it costs to put in that stock of incidentals I have mentioned down there, and keep them, and the general wear and tear on them, selling them at actual cost, what it costs this Government, considering what salaries are paid to clerks there, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee is a good enough accountant to find that it costs this Government much money.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas have one minute more. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I object.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in these United States there are all kinds of liars [applause]—there are artistic liars, there are inartistic liars, and then there is the common, ordinary liar.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I will hold the gentleman personally responsible to me if he calls me one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] will take his seat. The Sergeant at Arms will see that the gentleman takes his seat.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if I may have order—I hope that the gentleman [Mr. BLANTON] will not leave.

A MEMBER. He has left.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, when I look over here and see this grand old man from Pennsylvania sitting here [Mr. BUTLER], I know that he is a truthful man, and you could not make him lie. [Applause.] When I come over on this side and look at our distinguished leader [Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee], every man in this House will testify that you could not wring a falsehood from him. [Applause, all the Members rising.]

But, Mr. Speaker, I have in my mind's eye—I can not observe him just at this moment, of course—but I have in my mind's eye an individual, not a man—an individual, a creature, who is as common and base a liar as ever spoke a word of English in this country. [Applause.] I have in my mind's eye, Mr. Speaker, a man who, if he had the opportunity—mark my language; I want to stay within the rules of this House—who would if he had the opportunity place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the menu of the restaurant in this building where we get our lunches, without the cost price of the different articles, in order that he might make the people of Texas believe that you were getting your food free of charge at the cost of the taxpayers of this country. I know a miserable, cowardly creature—I have him in my mind's eye at this moment—who would go to the stationery room of the House Office Building, make inquiry as to the purchase of a whisky flask, and when he found that he could not get it because they did not have them for sale, would ask the superintendent to send to Philadelphia and buy him one, in order that he might parade it in Texas as though it was given to the membership of this House free of charge at the taxpayers' expense. That creature, as I say, I have in my mind's eye. I know this individual would charge you with nepotism in order that he might parade his virtue in Texas, and at the same time have two of his children on the pay roll of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, it is a harsh thing to speak about individuals, even if they are only in your mind's eye; but I, speaking for myself alone—I say it with as firm a conviction as I ever spoke a word from the floor of this House that I believe that individual, that creature that I have in my mind's eye, would do anything in order to accumulate wealth or to place himself forward from a political standpoint. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I want to say one word for the Texas delegation. I have not mentioned a name up to date, but I want to say to the membership on the Republican side of the House, because the membership on the Democratic side already know it—I speak the sentiment of every Member of the Texas delegation when I tell you that we hang our heads in shame and in humiliation every time BLANTON, of Texas, is referred to as our colleague. [Applause.] I speak for the Democratic Party here, I believe, the sentiment of every man in it, when I say that we look upon him as a liability and a distinct injury to our party. [Applause.] Ah, Mr. Speaker, I wish the rules of this House did not prevent me from expressing the viewpoint of all Members of the House. If I could only suspend the rules, Mr. Speaker, I would say what is in the hearts of the Members. I would say now, if the rules did not prevent me from saying it, I would say what 430 men believe at this moment, that THOMAS BLANTON, of Texas, is a discredit to the House of Representatives and ought to be kicked out. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of what has been said about the restaurant, the barber shop, and the stationery room, I think it is proper that there should be a brief statement made with regard to those institutions at this time. For many years, certainly far beyond my 25 years of service, certain colored men have been employed in the House who in addition to their other duties, for which they were paid a small salary, serve the Members and the employees of the House as barbers. I have never been shaved or had a hair cut in the House for which I have paid less than I would pay at any commercial shop anywhere. While a certain gentleman stated a moment ago that there was a cut-rate price, I have never heard of it. The necessity for the maintenance of barber shops in the House is apparent to anyone who knows anything about the business of the House. If Members and employees are to maintain a proper appearance, they certainly need the services of a barber and a hair cutter occasionally, and can not always find the time to go down town. It is necessary to have a barber shop. The barbers in the House are paid a small sum for work which they actually perform. In addition to that they serve the Members and employees, and they are paid for that service by the Members or the employees whom they serve.

We have had for many years a session allowance of $125 each for stationery. We procure that stationery through the stationery room. There lies on my desk to-day a statement from the stationery room to the effect that my stationery account is exhausted, and nothing has been purchased on that stationery account, so far as I know, except stationery and those things necessary for carrying on the work of my office. [Applause.] That is not an uncommon experience; it is, I think, the usual experience of Members who endeavor to serve their constituents by answering promptly and fully their correspondence.

We do furnish a room for a restaurant in this building. That is absolutely essential for the conduct of the business of the House and for the accommodation of those who have business with the House and its committees or of the visiting public. All are treated alike and all pay the same price. Quite recently an arrangement has been made under which under certain conditions it is possible that there will be something of a charge on the contingent fund for the maintenance of the restaurant, but that is doubtful. We pay at the restaurant for what we obtain there, and pay, I think, a very good price.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman know of any article that any Member has secured from the stationery room or the House restaurant without paying for it?

Mr. MONDELL. I know of no article that any Member has received or will receive from the restaurant or the stationery room that he has not paid for or will pay for.

Mr. ASWELL. And enough more to cover the overhead.

Mr. MONDELL. Undoubtedly; beyond all question. Now, I have never inquired of the keeper of the stationery room as to whether he could secure for me a whisky flask. [Laughter.] He is an accommodating gentleman, and if a Member of Congress asked him to buy a whisky flask for him I suppose he would feel it his duty to do so. I should think it would be a reflection on the Member to make such a request. I am not an adept in the great American game, and I have no knowledge whether any Member ever asked the gentleman in charge of the stationery room to buy him a poker set. If a Member desired a poker set—whatever that is—and was ready to pay for it, I suppose the accommodating young man who is in charge at the stationery room might feel disposed to buy it for him. I do not know just why, Mr. Speaker, it is deemed essential to drag that sort of thing into a discussion relative to the Congress. I have been here a long time, and I am glad to be able to say that with exceptions that are so rare as to be negligible—so rare that I can count them on the fingers of one hand—I would say that there has not been a man I have served with that has not been honest, upright, and faithful, nor a man who would under any circumstances stoop to graft. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming have another minute, in order that I may call his attention to a matter that I think should go into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman has referred to whisky flasks; and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has referred to that subject. In order that the record may be clear, I desire to state that on the 5th day of January of this year the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] went to the stationery room and asked for a whisky flask. They did not have it.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly not.

Mr. BARKLEY. And they advised him that they did not keep them for sale. He then requested the stationery room to order him one. The stationery room ordered him one from Charles M. Griskey Sons, of Philadelphia, Pa. The order is No. 1815, on the records of the stationery room. The flask was ordered under No. 573–3–3 Ost. It was a pint flask, covered with ostrich hide, for which Mr. BLANTON paid in cash at the time he got it, the price being $6. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. I assume that that was all done for the purpose of being able to make the statement that whisky flasks could be obtained in the stationery room. I can not say whether the Member from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is correctly quoted or not, but he certainly has been quoted all over the country as having stated, while exhibiting this same flask, that they were furnished to all Members from the stationery room.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is, no doubt, the flask he exhibited in Texas.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Wyoming, I think, has covered everything that was mentioned of any consequence in the statement of the gentleman from Texas except the question of mileage. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he knows how long it has been the law that a Member of Congress shall receive 20 cents a mile each way over the shortest traveled route between his home and Washington?

Mr. MONDELL. Much more than a quarter of a century.

Mr. STAFFORD. Since 1866.

Mr. SISSON. I think I can enlighten the gentleman. One of the first controversies that came up on the floor of the House after the Government was organized was the equalization of compensation of Members of Congress. In order that their compensation might be equalized the fathers of this Republic and the First Congress—or I think the second—provided that mileage should be paid from the home of the Member to the city of Washington and return, so that every Member of Congress might receive exactly the same compensation for services rendered here.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As a part of the salary?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have wondered why, since all through the history of the Republic the mileage has been given and such men have taken it as Madison, Lincoln, Clay, Blaine, Conkling, and Carlisle, the gentleman from Texas could not take it without being contaminated. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in order that it may be clear, may I say that the mileage allowance is granted once a session of Congress. For one, I desire to offer testimony to the effect that during my service here, while I never have traveled except as it was necessary to travel between Washington and my home, the mileage allowance made to me, though it is a considerable sum, has not fully paid the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. In order that the RECORD may show a little more accurately in reference to the stationery allowance, I want to say a word. Each Member of the House is entitled to a credit in the stationery account of $125 for each session of Congress. The average cost to the average Member of the House for his stationery supplies amounts to a great deal more than $125 for each session of Congress. That allowance was made years ago, before a Member of Congress even had a secretary, much less two. It is credit in the stationery room. The Member of Congress can withdraw the entire $125 in cash if he chooses to do so. That is what I have usually done since I have been a Member of the House. Then he pays for his stationery or other supplies of that character as he gets them in cash out of his own pocket. Having the right to withdraw the $125 in cash, he may obtain from the stationery room any kind of supplies which they will purchase for him, and it is then charged up to his $125, but when he does that he pays the other bills for his stationery out of pocket. It is in no sense graft. It is in no sense securing anything from the Government free of charge, and the insinuation that because a Member of the House has purchased some article which is not strictly stationery through the stationery room he has thereby participated in a species of graft has no basis in fact whatever. [Applause.] And such an insinuation is unworthy of any man with brains enough and any honor at all who is permitted to sit in this House. [Applause.]

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND JUSTICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11065) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11065, with Mr. DOWELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am glad to state that I represent some people in Texas who believe in constructive legislation. [Applause.] I represent largely the live stock and farming interests of western Texas. About 50 years ago under a live oak tree near the home of my late lamented friend, Lucien Parrish, there was organized the Texas Cattle Raisers' Association. At that time it was organized for the purpose of protecting the legitimate cattle raiser from what was actually known at that time as the "cattle rustler," or cattle thief, to protect the man who owned the cattle from the man who wanted to acquire them dishonestly. That organization has grown until it now is known as the Texas and Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association, comprising men in the live-stock industry of the best business attainments and moral standing, leading citizens of the States of Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, New Mexico, California, and Arizona. It has to-day a membership of something like 15,000, the largest organization in the interest of the live-stock industry in the world. This organization is now endeavoring to secure cheaper freight rates for the shipment of live stock to market and to pasture in other States. It has now an application, and its secretary is here asking for a cheaper rate on range cattle to the markets and to the feeding grounds of Kansas, Oklahoma, Wyoming, and the great northwest. A conference was held by representatives of the railroads in Chicago yesterday to see whether or not they could agree that Ex parte 72 should be removed and the 20 per cent increase of last year should be reduced. If that is not agreed to, it will then be taken up by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if it is granted it means a reduction in the shipment of cattle from Texas to the States of Wyoming, Montana, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Kansas of at least 50 cents per head. This great organization, that was headed by one of the ablest men in Texas last year, Hon. W. W. Turney, a live-stock grower as well as a great lawyer, composed of business men, of leading live-stock producers throughout the West, men who have given their lives to the live-stock industry, is asking certain things at the hands of Congress. The amendment which was passed last year to the War Finance Corporation permitting said corporation to rediscount live-stock loans, has been the means of loaning something like $30,000,000 in my State, which has somewhat relieved the live-stock producers and stimulated the price of live stock. The live-stock producer has had a hard struggle since the armistice was signed, and the drop in prices of his product, but I am happy to say that in my State conditions are a little improved at this time, so far as the prices of live stock, wool, and mohair are concerned. Representatives of this organization met in convention at Fort Worth, Tex., recently and passed certain resolutions, among them one asking for the continuance of the War Finance Corporation from July 1 of this year to January 1, 1923. I trust that some of the majority, who at present are in control of Congress, because I know the credit will go to that side over there, will offer a bill, as you are interested in the live-stock industry as I am, extending the provisions under which this finance corporation can rediscount live stock and agricultural paper until January 1, 1923.

Mr. Chairman, at the convention in Fort Worth recently certain resolutions were adopted. One of those commended the Members of Congress who had voted to revive the War Finance Corporation as applying to the rediscount of live-stock paper and commended the friends in Congress of the live-stock industry generally. I want to state to you that the work of that splendid organization—the War Finance Corporation—has been, in my judgment, the means of saving the live-stock industry from financial bankruptcy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, may I have one more minute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] asks unanimous consent for one additional minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Gentlemen, I do not wish to clutter up the RECORD. I do not think I have done that since I have been a Member of Congress. There have been very few times when I have asked to extend my remarks and a very few times have I asked to embrace in my remarks documents of any character, but here are some resolutions in which you are interested, because they commend you, passed by this nonpartisan organization at Fort Worth, and which they have asked me to present to the Congress. Inasmuch as I do not wish to take up your time by reading the resolutions, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including them, and I trust every Member will read them carefully, and I am sure he will be profited thereby. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the resolutions referred to:

Resolution approving stand of Congressman HUDSPETH.

Whereas an article was published in the Commercial Bulletin of Boston on March 11 showing the correspondence between Robert L. Studley, of the Boston wool dealers, and Congressman C. B. HUDSPETH, of El Paso, Tex., the letters of Mr. Studley showing the position and stand taken by the wool dealers in favor of ending the emergency tariff and the firm stand taken by Congressman CLAUDE B. HUDSPETH in the defense of the woolgrowers and the continuance of the emergency tariff until such time as a satisfactory permanent tariff may be enacted by Congress; and

Whereas the letters of Mr. HUDSPETH show the sentiment and ideas of the agricultural bloc in Congress and of all the believers in a just and protective tariff for the producers of raw material in the United States: Be it hereby

Resolved, That we, the New Mexico Woolgrowers in convention assembled in Albuquerque, N. Mex., March 16 and 17, 1922, do hereby cast a vote of thanks and appreciation to Congressman C. B. HUDSPETH and the entire agricultural bloc who are so ably defending the cause of the producers of raw material in the United States: Be it further

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to telegraph this resolution to Congressman HUDSPETH so as to cheer him on in his good work.

Resolutions adopted by Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association convention in session at Fort Worth, Tex., March 14, 15, and 16, 1922.

Whereas the needs of our great agricultural industry have received such intelligent and sympathetic attention in Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association indorses the action of those Congressmen and Senators who have, with such great determination and high sense of justice, endeavored adequately to protect the welfare of the agricultural and live-stock producer, and urges the continuation of their constructive and helpful action.

Resolution adopted by Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association convention in session at Fort Worth, Tex., March 14, 15, and 16, 1922.

Whereas, owing to drought and deflation many live-stock producers who have invested the earnings of a lifetime in ranches and improvements, now having their ranches inadequately stocked, and, due to a lack of live-stock collateral, are unable to avail themselves of the benefits obtained from the War Finance Corporation by others more fortunate; and

Whereas there is now functioning a Government agency operating through farm loan banks providing farmers with cheap money for a period of 33½ years, 3 per cent of the principal to be paid annually, but with the amount which any individual can apply for so small that it is impracticable for the live-stock producer: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association recommends the enactment at this session of Congress of an amendment to the farm loan act to include more fully grazing lands and improvements, and the increase of the loan limit sufficiently to place live-stock producers on a parity with other agricultural interests.

Resolution adopted by Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association convention in session at Fort Worth, Tex., March 14, 15, and 16, 1922.

Whereas we heartily commend the action of Congress in conferring upon the War Finance Corporation authority to make loans to producers on approved collateral through banks and loan companies, realizing that immense benefits have been and are being received from that source; and

Whereas we deplore the fact that in many sections, owing to necessary delay in forming companies to receive applications, climatic conditions which make it impossible to round up and count cattle in the winter months will prevent many worthy producers from obtaining much-needed relief before July 1, 1922: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we deem the extension for 12 months from July 1, 1922, of the powers granted to the War Finance Corporation vital to the interests of all producers; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of Agriculture and to all Senators and Representatives in Congress from the agricultural States.

Resolution adopted by Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association convention in session at Fort Worth, Tex., March 14, 15, and 16, 1922.

Whereas the Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association ever since the enactment of the transportation act have protested against the provision of the act known as section 15a, providing as a basis of rate making 5½ cents upon the aggregate value of the railroad in groups selected by the Interstate Commerce Commission as unjust, unreasonable, and unsound, and placing undue burden upon live-stock shippers, depriving them of the rights and remedies to secure reasonable rates, and fixing a standard which was impossible to attain upon reasonable rates that the industry could afford to pay; and

Whereas under the application of that act in the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission which puts the same into effect, commonly known as Ex parte 74, wherein 35 per cent was added to the rates in the western group, embracing all of the country east of the Rocky Mountains to the Mississippi River, including Chicago, in addition to the advance made of 25 per cent during the war, and thus increasing the pre-war rates by 65 or 70 per cent and making rates which are unjust, unreasonable, and prohibitory to live-stock shippers who have been deprived of the right to just and reasonable rates and compelled to pay unreasonable exactions destructive of their business, under which the business can not be carried on; and

Whereas the railroads under the present basis of operating expenses and with reduced volume of traffic that has been occasioned by these advances in rates have not been able to earn and can not earn anything approaching the 5½ per cent in the aggregate or on the aggregate value of the property as assigned to them by the Interstate Commerce Commission approximating $60,000 per mile in the western district far beyond the real value of the property for any purpose for which it can be used or sold; and

Whereas under and by virtue of this act the Interstate Commerce Commission itself is without the power and by its action had deprived the States of their power to regulate rates so as to make them just and reasonable, and the attempt to do so has proven wholly impossible, and whereby the shippers have been deprived of the rights and remedies which previously existed under the law to just and reasonable rates: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association in convention assembled at Fort Worth, Tex., on the 14th to 16th of March, 1922:

1. That we urge the repeal of this statute, to wit, section 15a, and the return to the previous standard of fixing rates as that standard existed for a long period of years under the Hepburn law up to the time of this enactment.

2. That such additional legislation be enacted as may be necessary to protect the public against obligations to pay rates founded upon unreasonable and unfair valuation of railroads used for the purpose of calculating the rates that should be paid upon any fixed percentage of value.

3. That such legislation be enacted and such change be made in the law which creates the labor board as will not prevent the railroads of the country from obtaining labor at fair and reasonable cost commensurate with its worth and which will relieve the public of the necessity of paying operating expenses unduly enhanced by the excessive cost of supplies and materials, and in this connection we declare it to be the consensus of opinion of the live-stock producers represented by this association that railroad rates, wages, cost of supplies and materials shall stand their reasonable share in the deflation along with live stock and farm products, and that they bear their fair share and burden of reconstruction resulting from necessities brought about by the war or otherwise in our economic conditions.

4. We indorse and commend the resolutions heretofore passed by this association on this subject, and especially commend the resolution passed by the American National Live Stock Association at its annual convention at Colorado Springs, January 12 to 14, 1922.

Resolution adopted by Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association Convention in session at Fort Worth, Tex., March 14, 15, and 16, 1922.

We denounce a tariff policy which discriminates against the live-stock producers and farmers of this country, and we demand that all import duties, whether levied for protection or for revenue, shall be so adjusted that they will not discriminate in favor of or against any industry, section, or class; and we especially denounce the systematic effort which is now being made by industries which have been highly favored by the Government through so many years to remove the duty on everything which they buy from the producers while still levying a duty on everything which they sell to the producers.

We favor a national policy of protection on labor and products that treats all classes, sections, and industries alike, and are opposed to any legislation that compels producers to buy in a protected market and sell in a free one.

We indorse the declaration of principles of the Southern Tariff Association and commend the intelligent work of that association.

Resolution adopted by Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association Convention in session at Fort Worth, Tex., March 14, 15, and 16, 1922.

Whereas the "announcement" and "plan" proposed by the committee of six for the creation of a national live stock and meat board appears to present a practical method of establishing cooperation between the various branches of the live-stock industry in matters where there is a mutuality of interest; and

Whereas the plan proposed is broad and democratic in principle and demands an equitable distribution among the cooperators of the benefits to be gained; and

Whereas the plan provides especially for a comprehensive educational campaign showing the relative value of meat for food, which campaign should greatly increase the consumption of meat and result in restoring it to its proper place in the diet of the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association heartily approves the "announcement" and "plan" and requests its president to appoint one representative to serve on the committee of 17; and the association commends the plan to the National Live Stock Exchange and respectfully asks the cooperation of that body in financing it, as outlined by the committee.

Resolution adopted by Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association Convention in session at Fort Worth, Tex., March 14, 15, and 16, 1922.

Whereas additional port facilities on the Texas coast are essential to the progress of Texas and the development of the State's great resources; and

Whereas such additional port facilities would aid materially in lessening the burden of existing high freight charges which are now retarding development and stifling industry in all lines: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association in convention assembled hereby petitions and urges the Federal Government to take such action as will assure the early establishment of such port facilities as the Federal Government may see fit to select.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For temporary employees in the Department of State, $250,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $2,500 per annum and not more than eight persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the chairman having the bill in charge as to the reason of the committee for not placing these empoyees provided for in this item of $250,000 on the statutory roll in the paragraph just preceding?

Mr. HUSTED. I will say to the gentleman that that is solely for the convenience of Congress. I think the State Department would have preferred to have them on the statutory roll. But these are temporary employees only. They are the men who are engaged in the visé and passport work. When that law is repealed, as it probably will be some time in the near future, this item will go out of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then do I understand that this entire amount of $250,000 is utilized for work in connection with the viséing of passports?

Mr. HUSTED. I will not say that it is all of it, but that is certainly the major part of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I suggest to the gentleman that originally this appropriation for temporary employees was not for any special work, but developed as a result of the war, and I am rather interested in hearing the chairman state that it is almost exclusively used for visé work.

Mr. HUSTED. It is really work that grew out of the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. But Secretary Lansing, when he appeared before the legislative subcommittee years back, right after the war, asking for a lump-sum appropriation for temporary employees, urged its adoption because of the need of clerical force in all bureaus of the department. Now, if this money is to be used almost exclusively in the visé division—and last year, as I notice, we appropriated $275,000 for it—it would be my opinion that the appropriation could be much more largely reduced. I have had occasion once or twice, maybe three or four times, to visit the visé bureau, and I find the clerks there without anything to do, apparently, and taking things leisurely. I would like to have the gentleman state the position of the committee in reducing the clerical force, now that the war is over and the State Department does not need the same maximum number of clerks that they did during the war. I wish to commend the gentleman for having reduced the appropriation from $275,000 last year to $250,000 as carried in this bill. But did the gentleman make any inquiry as to the number of clerks that are employed out of this fund and in what bureaus they are employed?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes; inquiry was made. Two hundred and thirty-eight clerks are employed out of this particular appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then those 238 clerks would not be all used in the work of the visé division?

Mr. HUSTED. Not all of them, but that is the burden of it. They are scattered around through the department, principally in the passport and visé bureaus.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes that since we agreed to a peace with Germany and Austria there is not the need of the clerical force in connection with the viséing of passports of those coming from Germany as before the negotiation of peace. Prior to the negotiation of peace all applications for passports on the part of Germans and Austrians had to be passed upon by the department officials here, but since peace is established the consular offices are given full charge of passing upon those passports, as in every other country.

Mr. MANN. Are they?

Mr. STAFFORD. They are. There are a few exceptional cases that are referred for review to the department here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I will state to the gentleman that I have had a number of cases where we had to obtain information from the State Department as to where a passport was viséed by a consular officer abroad, and the consular officer had to report to the State Department and obtain authority to visé the passport.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the practice in the approval of passports, with all persons seeking admission to this country, if the application shows the applicant be otherwise acceptable, the consular officer is fully authorized to approve it. It is only when the application shows some facts which should be submitted for consideration to the department here that the application is forwarded for review by the department.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be correct, although in some of the cases that I have had with the department that condition certainly did not exist, to my knowledge, and I do not think it existed at all.

I would like to say this, if I may, in the gentleman's time. Of course these matters have to be acted upon promptly, and the State Department is prompter in acting upon matters before it connected with passports than any other bureau or branch of the Government in acting upon anything before their departments or bureaus in my observation and experience.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to say to the gentleman also that the clerks in the State Department—and it is a rather remarkable exception to the general rule—work until 5.30 o'clock every day. There is not any slacking among the clerks in the State Department. We went into this very carefully, indeed, and I am sure we have made as great a reduction as the service will stand.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am very much interested in and somewhat surprised at the statement of the chairman that the clerks in the Department of State work every day until 5.30 o'clock. If that is the condition there, then certainly the appropriation should not have been reduced $25,000 unless the current rate is at the rate of $250,000, because there is no desire on the part of Congress or any committee of Congress to compel the clerks to work overtime every day in the year.

Mr. HUSTED. I will tell you why it was reduced. It was reduced because the officials in the State Department found that with better organization they could do all of the work during the current year for $275,000, for which they had estimated they would need $400,000. That was the result of better organization in the department; and we believed there was room for still further improvement, and that in the second year of any administration you have the right to expect a little higher degree of efficiency than you had in the first year. [Applause.] Therefore we assumed that we could make that reduction.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PASSPORT BUREAUS.

For salaries and expenses of maintenance of passport bureaus at New York City, N. Y.; San Francisco, Calif.; Chicago, Ill.; Seattle, Wash.; and New Orleans, La., $50,000.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I wanted to inquire of the gentleman from New York as to what, if any, bureaus at present are being maintained other than in the city of Washington?

Mr. HUSTED. Exactly the same bureaus as are mentioned in this item. There is not any elimination and there is not any addition. The department advised us that they could carry on this work for less money if we gave them a lump sum, because they found that some of the bureaus did not use all of their appropriation and other bureaus would run into a deficiency if all the work was properly done, and they told us if we gave them a lump sum they could save the additional $7,820 which was carried in the current year's item.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That was not carried in the form it is now? It was scattered out in other items?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes. It was the same form, except it gave the appropriation by places.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is what I say; in different places in the bill.

Mr. HUSTED. In the current law there is an allocation of specific amounts for each one of the passport bureaus, but, as I say, the department officials advised us that they could save this $7,820 if given in a lump sum, and we thought it was economy to do it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. There is no increase in this item?

Mr. HUSTED. No.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman satisfied that there is no intention on the part of the State Department to cut out or reduce the work of any of these bureaus now in existence?

Mr. HUSTED. I feel perfectly satisfied that it is the intention of the State Department to allocate to each one of the bureaus now in this item an amount of money sufficient to do all the work that comes to it.

Mr. MANN. A year ago it was either the State Department or the Committee on Appropriations that wanted to cut these out. I did not know whether that view was being expressed in an indirect way or not in this bill.

Mr. HUSTED. I will not say that the State Department did not feel perhaps that it would be advisable to cut them out, but they are in the law, and so long as they are in the law I feel sure they will allocate a sufficient amount to do all the work.

Mr. MANN. Of course, every department always says it can get along with less money on a lump-sum appropriation. They do not spend any less by having a lump-sum appropriation. There may be appropriated a little more when they have a specific appropriation, but there is no less spent when they have a lump-sum appropriation. Under this they can cut out San Francisco or Seattle or Chicago or New Orleans, if they want to.

Mr. HUSTED. I must take a little exception to that statement, just as it was made. I hardly think they would cut out any one of the bureaus established by the act.

Mr. MANN. They could discharge all the employees and refuse to pay them anything. It would not be the first time such a thing has been done.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from New York may not be familiar with the fact that three of these offices are doing a considerable volume of business. The New York, Chicago, and San Francisco offices are undoubtedly a great convenience to a large number of people. On the other hand, when you consider Seattle and get down to New Orleans, there is a tremendously less volume of business transacted. I notice from the hearings that in one quarter at the New Orleans office there was a business of only about $100 done, and at Seattle about twice that amount. I can conceive it would be a public advantage that these smaller offices, unless they picked up much in business, should be either considerably curtailed or else discontinued. The Seattle business ought to be tolerably well cared for from the San Francisco office anyway, I should think.

Mr. HUSTED. I feel sure that the State Department will not do violence to the evident legislative intention that these offices shall be maintained and a sufficient sum provided to carry on the work.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the $50,000.

Mr. DENISON. I make this motion for the purpose of calling the attention of the Members of the House to a condition which I never knew existed until recently with reference to the viséing of passports issued by our State Department. Last year a gentleman from my district, a Mr. Duggon, from West Frankfort, Ill., who came to this country from the Republic of France, I think in 1903, when he was a boy, applied for a passport to return to France. He came here with his parents when a child, and he had been naturalized and was an American citizen at that time with all the rights of an American citizen. He had married and had some little children. He decided that he would like to return to France and look up the relatives of his wife who lived there. He obtained a passport for that purpose and applied to the French consul in New York to have it viséed; the French consul refused to visé it on the ground that he had not returned to France and joined the French Army and fought for France in the late war. So he was unable to return. Now, recently the gentleman decided that he would send his wife to France so that she might see her parents and visit them, not asking to go himself. So I took the matter up with the French consul in New York and with the French Embassy here in Washington, to see if her passport would be viséed and if she would be permitted to visit her parents in France, provided she should obtain a passport from our Government to do so. I was informed that she might be permitted to go to France, but that she would not be permitted to return here. In other words, the French Government takes the position that a French citizen can not become an American citizen by naturalization so as to lose the duty which he still owes to the Republic of France to return and fight for that Republic in any war in which she may become involved. It is one of the most unjust things I have ever heard of, and now this married lady, Mrs. Duggon, the wife of an American citizen, can not go to France and visit her parents without being detained there by the French Republic and separated from her husband and children, because, they say, her husband, an American citizen, did not leave his own family and country and return to France to fight with the French Army.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Was there not some considerable discussion of the problem of dual citizenship at the time of the war, and did our State Department ever clearly announce the fact that dual citizenship was not recognized by this country? I think that is one of the most significant problems we have before us.

Mr. DENISON. I am not able to answer the gentleman about that, but I think that if a man becomes an American citizen he ought to be protected in his rights in any country, and I think that the State Department or some authority in this country ought to take this matter up in such a way with the French Republic as to see that American citizens have at least the same rights in foreign countries as foreign citizens have in this country. Now, here is a great injustice being done. This good woman knows what destruction was done in France and what suffering was caused there by the German invasion. She would like to look up and visit her parents and relatives over there, but they will not allow her to do so.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that the French Government now maintain that a French citizen can not expatriate himself by becoming a citizen of the United States under our naturalization laws?

Mr. DENISON. They maintain that he can not do so to the extent of being released from military duty in France in case France becomes involved in war.

Mr. MANN. If he can become an American citizen, and if he is expatriated, being a French citizen—of course, the other does not follow, but I thought it had been settled long ago. It may be I am not up to date since the World War.

Mr. DENISON. I will say to my colleague that I, too, thought so, but I have found out differently, and I have just obtained the information from the French Embassy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, maybe I can throw a little light on this subject. The doctrine of expatriation is distinctively a principle of American foreign policy, namely, that a person who leaves one country and becomes the citizen of another by naturalization thereby divests himself of citizenship in the country which he left and of all obligations to that country. That principle, however, is maintained by hardly any other country. Decisions of the Supreme Court so late, I think, as 1829 doubted or denied the doctrine. An opinion was given by Caleb Cushion, our Attorney General, expressing limitations upon the right. So late as 1850 Secretaries of State refused interposition on behalf of naturalized citizens who returned to their native land. When James Buchanan was Secretary of State he took strong grounds in favor of the principle, and was, I may say, a lifelong advocate of it. The statute asserting the right of expatriation in unequivocal terms was passed in 1868, declaring it be "an inherent right of all people." The most illuminating discussion in furnishing the foreign viewpoint is in correspondence between M. De Giers, Russian foreign minister, and our own Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State under the first administration of President Cleveland. One opposing contention is that a country might be entirely disabled in its military strength and in its laboring population if that principle were recognized. It has been the cause of friction very frequently between our country and Germany, and in earlier years with England. The vital point to which I wish to call attention is this: Our own country maintains the doctrine of expatriation. I was not aware that France had recently insisted so strongly as the gentleman states, but Spain, France, Russia, Germany, and most of the countries of Europe deny the principle. I am frank to say that I am a little surprised at the case which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] mentions. What was the age of this person the gentleman referred to?

Mr. DENISON. Ten years old. I think he came here in 1903. He had gotten the passport and had bought his steamer passage. They refused to visé it there because he had not returned to France.

Mr. BURTON. It is to be hoped that since the war the insistence of the foreign countries upon that principle that they are entitled to military service of anyone born in that country will be abated. But in this controversy our country takes one position, and practically all the countries of Europe take another.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, another case in relation to a passport came to my attention the other day. It was a case where our consul in a foreign country undertook to interpret the immigration laws and denied a passport on the ground that in the statement made by the one who applied for it he convicted himself of being a contract laborer. It gave rise to a very interesting and very difficult situation. The facts were simply these: The man's brother lived in this country and is a citizen of this country; his uncle is engaged in business in this country. The uncle had written to the young man that he would employ him, or see that he was able to take care of himself, so that he would not become a public charge and that he would associate him with himself in business. Of course, the young man made affidavit before the consul that he was coming to this country to be associated in business with his uncle. The consul in writing a letter to him makes a statement that if he had such an arrangement made he was in violation of the immigration law.

I took the matter up with the State Department, and one of the clerks down there told me the other day that the consul had exceeded his authority, that that was a matter for the immigration authorities, and therefore he should have viséed the passport and let the immigration authorities determine when the man landed in this country whether it was in violation of the immigration laws.

Apropos of that, however, it indicates the need of an increased force over that of pre-war times, for there will be many hundreds, if not thousands, of cases like that which will require much more clerical help than would have been necessary before the world was so thoroughly disorganized.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

AMBASSADORS AND MINISTERS.

For ambassadors extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Peru, Spain, and Turkey, at $17,500 each, $227,500.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it will be noted that this item carries the sum of $17,500 to provide the compensation for an ambassador to Mexico. A similar appropriation has been available for a considerable time, but up to the present no diplomatic representative of the rank of ambassador has been accredited by the President to that Republic. I have heretofore called the attention of the House to the official relations, or lack of official relations, between the Government of the United States and that of Mexico. I, like other gentlemen, I have no doubt, have been hopeful that the administration would bring about a situation whereby the Republic of Mexico might be recognized officially and cordial and amicable relations established between the people of Mexico and the people of the United States.

It has been charged in the press and otherwise that certain American oil interests and certain American international bankers, who have been dealing in securities of the Mexican Government, have been active in preventing recognition by the United States of the Republic of Mexico. Some time ago I introduced a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules, setting forth the fact that the press of the country had been filled with such charges, and in which I asked this House to authorize the Foreign Affairs Committee to investigate the charges. But until this good hour, notwithstanding I have requested a hearing before the Committee on Rules, that resolution slumbers undisturbed in the files of the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he ever expects the Committee on Rules will report a resolution introduced by a Member of the minority?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In answer to the gentleman from Virginia, I would like to entertain the hope that the Committee on Rules may report the resolution regardless of the political complexion of its author. But I have absolutely no hope of the Rules Committee reporting any such resolution. It might report a resolution jamming through the House some piece of legislation which the managers on the part of the majority fear to permit their own membership to propose amendments to or vote upon such amendments. It is entirely probable that the Rules Committee will in a short time sponsor a rule to whip through this body some measure which it is afraid to have its own membership amend or consider, but there is no hope of bringing out a resolution of the kind I have referred to. I want to call the attention of the House to a statement made by the President in reference to Mexico.

Some time ago Mr. John Barrett, of South American and Central American fame, who for a number of years was Director of the Pan American Union, sent inquiries to 200 prominent citizens throughout Latin America and asked the question as to what they believed the United States might do on its own initiative to promote Pan American friendship. From 141 prominent citizens throughout South and Central America there came back the response that the United States should recognize Mexico on terms compatible with the dignity and the honor of the United States and Mexico, which meant "early recognition of Mexico by the United States on a basis consistent with the natural and unexaggerated dignity and sovereignty and rights of both nations, with concessions, if necessary, on the part of both, inspired by that same spirit of conciliation and cooperation which characterized the United States and other Governments at the recent arms conference."

Mr. Barrett sent a letter to the President in which he set forth a summary of these replies, and what did the President reply? The President wrote to Mr. Barrett in part as follows:

I am not at all surprised at the expression of sentiment in the Latin American Republics which your letter conveys. As a matter of fact, we feel that way here in the Capital of our own Republic.

Mr. Chairman, if the President of the United States feels that the greatest thing which America could do to bring about Pan American friendship is to recognize the Republic of Mexico and its government, what influence is it that ties the hands of the President until he fails to do the thing which he is convinced ought to be done to restore Pan American friendship? If the Chief Executive of this Nation, who, under the Constitution, is vested with sole power to negotiate with foreign governments, feels that the greatest thing that America can do to restore Pan American friendship is recognition of the sister Republic of Mexico, why does not he recognize her and restore those relations which ought to exist between these two great Republics of the western world? What else does the President say?

There is really no difference of opinion as to what is necessary to restore former friendly relations between our own Republic and that of Mexico. The only hitch anywhere is one of proceedings. Undoubtedly both countries are of the same mind, excepting that we can not arrive at a program which carries the whole situation in one complete program which is to be executed at one time.

In other words, the President issues a statement to the world that it is only a question of quibbling over procedure, that it is only a question of Alphonse and Gaston, that it is only a question of diplomatic red tape. I say that the administration of this Government ought to be big enough, generous enough, statesmanlike enough to do the right and proper thing regardless of all the formal frivolities that sometimes obstruct and complicate international relationship.

But there are hopes that recognition may be brought about. I quote from a dispatch from the capital of Mexico, carried a few days ago by the Associated Press, dated April 4, which states that Mr. Doheny, one of the representatives of the five great American oil companies, is now in the City of Mexico, that he is in conference with the secretary of the treasury of Mexico, and that that secretary may probably visit the United States within a short time. What does Mr. Doheny have to say? Why is it necessary for Mr. Doheny, a private citizen, representing American-owned oil companies operating in Mexico, to carry on negotiations with the Mexican Government? When was it proclaimed that the United States itself had not within its own agencies, its own diplomatic agencies, sufficient strength and wisdom and power to carry on the diplomatic negotiations of the United States Government, when it was announced to the country that these functions are to be abdicated or delegated to owners of oil companies and international bankers?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Doheny—and I have no reflection to make upon him as an individual—is in Mexico not as Mr. Doheny, but he is there as the representative of five great American-owned oil companies that are in a controversy with the President and the Government of Mexico over oil and oil taxes. Mr. Doheny is quoted as follows:

Mr. Doheny has declined to discuss his visit, except to say that everything is in splendid shape.

What is it that is in splendid shape? Everything, says Mr. Doheny. He is quoted as saying that the Government has kept faith. With whom has the Government of Mexico kept faith? What are the diplomatic relations between Mexico and Mr. Doheny? The commission of what Government does Mr. Doheny bear? Where are the credentials of Mr. Doheny to represent the American Government or the American people? Whom do you represent, Mr. Doheny? He represents five great American oil companies and is carrying on diplomatic relations with the Republic of Mexico. Let us go a little further.

He is quoted as saying:

The Government has kept faith and we all have confidence in President Obregon.

Mr. Chairman, who are "we" in whose voice Mr. Doheny is speaking? Is it the editorial "we," meaning Mr. Doheny, as the representative of five American companies, or does the "we" mean the American Government and the American people? How does he conclude his interview?

The oil agreements last fall have been observed.

The oil agreements made last fall! With whom were those agreements made? Agreements made with the President and the Government of Mexico with these American oil interests, carrying on private negotiations upon which perhaps depends the action of this Government in recognizing or withholding recognition of the Republic of Mexico. Oil is at the bottom of difficulties in the path of recognition of our sister Republic.

When did it become necessary for the diplomatic officers of this Government to await the adjustment of foreign relations until international bankers who visited Mexico last fall for the purpose of conferring with Mexico and the Government there should arrange their own private affairs? When did it become necessary for this Government's diplomatic agencies to wait in silence, to lie dormant, to remain quiet until private citizens can wring from a neighboring Government such concessions as they demand on account of their interests in oil and on account of the securities of another Government? If the oil interests and if the international banking interests are not the interests that are preventing recognition I want to know who is preventing recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the President of the United States said to Mr. Barrett that we here in the United States agree that the greatest thing that the United States can do to bring about Pan American friendship is to recognize the Republic of Mexico, and if, as Mr. Doheny says, the Government of Mexico has kept the faith with American oil interests, what unseen force is it that is holding back the diplomatic arm of this Government from extending recognition to the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is it not possible the arrangement with Mr. Doheny is a condition precedent to the recognition?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If that is true, the presence of Mr. Doheny in Mexico offers some hope of solving this whole situation. I am hopeful that if the oil companies can be satisfied—but I am not so hopeful that they can be—I am hopeful if they are satisfied, ways will be found to remove the difficulties that now obstruct the restoration of diplomatic relations. The great Government of the United States, so the President says, would extend recognition except for certain formalities and certain matters of procedure. The United States Government ought to be big enough and generous enough in its dealings with Central and South American Republics and the Republic of Mexico not to quibble over inconsequential things of that kind; but it ought to act in a large and generous spirit in the recognition of the rights and the dignities of these Republics, and ought to set them a worthy example in government. We must remember that these Republics have not behind them the traditions that fill the history of our glorious past. We must remember that they are not of the Anglo-Saxon race, that has ruled itself for 600 years. We must remember that they are weak and struggling nations, seeking to win their way forward to self-government and into the enjoyment of republican and democratic institutions, and that they have taken the United States as their great type, and we ought not to thrust them back in their endeavor to obtain their proper place among the sisterhood of nations. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The people of no State in this Union suffered more from the revolutionary disturbances in Mexico than the people of the State of Arizona. Arizona is a border State. A number of our citizens were shot by bullets which fell on the American side of the line during battles between the contending Mexican forces. Many of them lost their lives in the interior of Mexico. Many more of them lost their property and barely escaped with their lives. But it is now believed that the present Government of the Republic of Mexico is so firmly established that it can and will properly perform the international obligations that it owes to the other Governments of the world, and that for this reason it should now be recognized by the President of the United States as the de facto and de jure Government of Mexico.

The citizens of Arizona are better acquainted than the people of other parts of the United States with the present administration in the City of Mexico. Gen. Alvaro Obregon, who heads that administration, is from the State of Sonora, which adjoins Arizona on the south. He has been intimately acquainted in a business way with many of our citizens. He understands the conditions in the United States better than any person who has been in supreme authority in Mexico for a great many years. He has demonstrated his ability to maintain law and order and to assure a greater degree of security for life and property within the Republic of Mexico than has existed since the revolution began in 1910.

In keeping with sentiments of friendship and good will, the senate of the fifth Legislature of the State of Arizona, by unanimous vote, has requested the President of the United States to extend full recognition to the Republic of Mexico and to its President, Gen. Alvaro Obregon. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a memorial adopted by the Arizona State Senate on March 17, 1922.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is it not true that there are seven other States that have passed similar resolutions?

Mr. HAYDEN. The States of California, Texas, Oklahoma, Kentucky, Maryland, Illinois, and Michigan have also memorialized the President to recognize the existing government of the Republic of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The memorial is as follows:

FIFTH STATE LEGISLATURE, FIRST SPECIAL SESSION,
State of Arizona.

Senate memorial 1.

To the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and to Arizona's Representatives in Congress:

Your memorialists, the senate of the fifth Legislature of the State of Arizona, in special session assembled, do respectfully represent:

That being a "border State" and adjacent to the great State of Sonora, of the Republic of Mexico, Arizona is keenly alive to the problems now confronting and which for a decade past have confronted the said Republic of Mexico.

That your memorialists being men of affairs of the State of Arizona, chosen from the mining and cattle interests, mercantile life, and the professions, see with the clearness born of intimate relationship the magnificent struggle that has been waged, the seemingly insurmountable obstacles that have been overcome by the newborn Republic of Mexico, and the glorious achievements that have been attained by the unselfish devotion to duty, the untiring energy, the honesty of purpose, and tenacious will to lead his countrymen into the peaceful enjoyment or harmonious brotherhood by Alvaro Obregon, President of Mexico.

That from a chaos thereto unknown and a misery never before experienced in the Western Hemisphere Mexico has in less than one and one-half years emerged triumphant, and to-day faces the dawn of national achievement, seeking from her strong northern neighbors her just recognition, that she may be enabled to take her place in the God-given light of national equality.

That but one short year ago Arizona, in the spirit of western manhood, expressed her faith in Mexico and the man who, like our own illustrious Washington, had, as soldier and statesman, led his people to a safe and lasting peace, by a memorial to the Congress of the United States, praying for just recognition. That quickly following the lead of Arizona similar messages of confidence and faith were speeded to the Halls of Congress from the States of California, Texas, Oklahoma, Kentucky, Maryland, Illinois, and Michigan, representing 40,000,000 souls, urging the immediate recognition of Mexico.

That to-day is witnessed in Mexico an era of industry and prosperity plainly indicative of permanent peace—farming and ranching restored, industrial and mining activities steadily increasing. During the 15 months' occupancy of the Presidency by Alvaro Obregon no American or other foreigner in Mexico has been killed: It is therefore

Resolved by the Senate of the fifth Legislature of the State of Arizona in special session assembled, That time has amply demonstrated the statesmanship of the President of Mexico, his clarity of vision and singleness of purpose, to place his country firmly amongst the great stable governments of the earth; that Mexico is no longer a belligerent nation, torn with internal strife, but a country of peaceful pursuits and honorable ambitions, and that no good reasons, no just causes, exist to further deny to it the just recognition which the United States of America itself achieved only after its baptism of blood; it is therefore further

Resolved, That the President be requested to recommend to the Congress of the United States that full recognition be extended to the Republic of Mexico and to its President, the Hon. Alvaro Obregon; it is also further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, the President of the Senate, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST and Hon. RALPH CAMERON, United States Senators, and Hon. CARL HAYDEN, Congressman, and that they each be requested and urged to use all honorable means to further the prayed-for recognition of Mexico. Also that an engrossed copy be transmitted to the Hon. Alvaro Obregon, President of the Republic of Mexico.

Adopted by unanimous vote of the senate March 17, 1922.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio rises in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the suspension of work in the mines of our country calls attention to one of our greatest industries. We realize this when we reflect and observe that during the last year, according to the United States Geological Survey, it is estimated that 494,500,000 tons of bituminous and anthracite coal were produced in the United States. This industry affects the prosperity, the comfort, and happiness of our people, and, either directly or indirectly, touches the life of everyone.

There are approximately 700,000 men engaged as miners in the 10,000 mines in the United States, 70 per cent of whom are organized and 30 per cent unorganized. Besides these men who are investing their lives in this great industry, millions of dollars in capital have been used to develop it.

In the year 1919, which seems to be the latest figures completed by the Government, 5,793 men were employed in the mines in my district, producing 4,575,406 tons of coal, valued at $9,737,866.

The wage scale that was in effect under the contract expiring March 31, 1922, provides for the following wages:

It should be said in this connection that the miners furnish the tools with which they work and their powder.

One of the disturbing factors in the coal-mining industry, both for the operator and the miner, is that the mines do not run regularly. For example, in 1919, according to official figures from the Government, the miners in my district worked on an average only 162 days during that year. This would be something near the average number of days that the average miner would be employed in a year. The operator has money invested and other expenses during the time the mine is idle and the miner is not able to engage in profitable employment. Various causes are assigned for this irregularity. When business is good one of the contributing causes is the lack of necessary cars that are not always furnished by the railroad when needed to keep the mines running and the miners actively employed. Then when there is a depression in business the demand for the production of coal is consequently lessened. High freight rates contribute to the cost to the public. These and other things must be taken into consideration for an intelligent understanding of the mining industry.

During the suspension which is now in effect the officers of the United Mine Workers have ordered a sufficient number of men from the several local unions to cooperate with the owners of the mines that the property in and around the mines may be preserved during the suspension.

The central competitive field embraces the coal fields in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and western Pennsylvania. This field, from a good many angles, seems to be looked upon, and has been for many years, as the base of the industry in wage agreements and other matters. It is estimated that the central competitive field produces at least one-half of the bituminous coal of the country. For many years the general custom has been for the operators and miners in this field to meet in conference at the expiration of their contracts and make adjustments and new agreements.

The contract under which the mines have recently operated was signed in New York two years ago and provided for a contract extending until March 31, 1922. This contract was signed by the operators for the central competitive field and the representatives of the United Mine Workers in joint conference. That contract contained the following provision:

Resolved, That an interstate joint conference be held prior to April 1, 1922; the time and place of holding such meetings is referred to a committee of two operators and two miners from each State herein represented, together with the international officers of the United Mine Workers' organization.

This provision in the contract has figured in the discussion and the situation that developed, and precipitated the present suspension, the miners contending that they could not continue work beyond March 31, 1922, for the reason that they had no contract under which to work, and that a majority of the operators refused to meet them in conference as had been the custom heretofore and as provided in the contract. The representatives of the miners offered to meet in joint conference. It seems to be undisputed that some of the operators were willing to meet in joint conference, and others were unwilling, contending that it would be fruitless. The stubborn fact remains that they did not meet in joint conference and confer. Some of the operators, perhaps a majority in the central competitive field, were willing to confer as provided in the contract. It is reported to me that practically all of the operators in my district were willing to confer as provided in the contract, and went so far as to make arrangements to select a scale committee, but others in the central competitive field, particularly western Pennsylvania, were unwilling to meet and confer in joint conference, and since all of the operators would not agree to the conference there has been none. Perhaps all of the operators are willing to confer by district, but the miners insist that the method that has been followed for many years should be continued, and contract adjustments made for the whole competitive field in joint conference.

For some time different officials and agencies of the Government were at work in an attempt to persuade the operators and miners to confer according to the resolution in their last contract. On March 31 Secretary of Labor Davis issued the following statement:

All of the Government's efforts in the proffer of mediation, conciliation, and compromise have failed to save the country from the national strike test of economic strength between employer and employee in the coal industry.

In this dispute in the coal industry President Harding and other Government agencies, chiefly the Department of Labor, have for weeks counseled this conference provided for in the last joint agreement between the operators and the miners. In this effort the President and myself have had neither legal right nor personal desire to dictate any program. Our one desire has been to induce by persuasion and urgence the operators and miners to discharge the obligations they assumed themselves to confer again for the shaping of a new agreement.

These efforts began in February after the refusal of some of the central competitive States operators to meet in accordance with the resolution adopted in March, 1920, providing for a preliminary conference to meet prior to April 1 to arrange a time and place for a meeting to negotiate a new agreement.

I have always believed—and every citizen is with me in the belief—that employers and employees who have signed a wage agreement or contract should observe it in spirit and to the letter. If the two parties to a trade dispute get together it is always possible to work out a satisfactory settlement and maintain peace.

In fairness it must be said that the miners' officials were willing and ready to go into the conference agreed upon, but some of the operators declined to meet, alleging that competitive factors and Federal grand jury indictments prevented any such favorable outcome as to the continuation of the existing agreements, and hence the "preliminary meeting" would prove unsuccessful. Others said that they were willing to confer, but that unless all central competitive States operators would attend, such a meeting would be barren of results and futile.

Also several outlying districts with a combined tonnage output much larger than that of the central competitive States protest the right of central competitive States to fix the basic wage for the bituminous coal industry, not only because of their minority production but because competition of nonunion coal affects the said outlying districts more than the said central competitive States.

The competitive States arrangement is not of governmental making, nor is it a new experiment. It has been in operation since 1898, and the records disclose the fact that in past years the operators as well as the miners' officials have looked upon it as a fixed and basic agency in the bituminous-coal industry.

There may be room for argument on some of these contentions, but they do not efface the main fact that operators and miners were bound to a conference, that this conference might have led to a new agreement, and the country might not have been confronted with a stoppage of coal production, a suspension avoided, ample supplies of coal, and a gradual reduction in prices would have resulted.

I can not let the opportunity pass without expressing keen disappointment at the failure of certain operators to fulfill the terms of their obligation to meet in conference with a view to peace in the coal industry for two years more. They have turned their backs on a chance to lay bare, not only to the miners but to the public, their reasons, at least, for declining a new wage arrangement. The public is entitled to these reasons, and the press would have fairly supplied them. Even though the operators were convinced that it could come to nothing, their entrance into conference would have removed any stigma of a breach of faith.

There may be faults on both sides of this bituminous dispute, but the side that openly repudiates its written and signed obligations has crippled its case before the bar of public opinion.

The anthracite industry presents a pleasing contrast, for its operators and miners are now meeting directly. There may be a suspension, but there is a negotiation and a genuine desire to agree. This clearly illustrates what the Government has sought all along in the bituminous field. There is not now, and there never has been, any disposition in Washington to force conditions upon employers, employees, or the public.

One unfortunate fact in the bituminous coal industry is that it is overdeveloped by fully 30 per cent, largely as a result of high prices during the war and the abnormal boom of 1920.

Coal production for 1921, on account of the general depression in the steel and allied industries, dropped to the 1911 basis, or only 407,000,000 tons, as compared with 563,000,000 tons produced in 1920. This explains to a large extent the present problem confronting the employers and employees of the coal industry.

At best bituminous miners do not work on an average more than 200 days during the year under normal conditions. When that average is reduced by 25 to 40 per cent, as was the case in most of the union districts last year, it can be appreciated that an abnormal and irregular condition of employment is created.

From the union mine point of view the situation is further complicated by readjustment of wages in nonunion mines before the expiration of union agreements, which has enabled the nonunion mines to secure more than their relative share of coal orders.

As the strike in the bituminous industry is inevitable, the industry is squarely on trial before the public. At this stage it is simply an economic dispute in which the chief sufferers will be the operators and miners themselves. During the strike the administration will watch developments and be ready to safeguard the public welfare whenever it is menaced.

A Government survey indicates that on April 1 there will be in stock or storage about 10,000,000 tons of anthracite and by-product coke and 65,000,000 tons of bituminous coal. This means that the railroads, public utilities, manufacturing industries, and retail coal dealers will have on hand nearly two months' supply of coal. The operators state that the production from nonunion mines will meet at least 50 per cent of the normal needs of the country.

On the strength of these facts there will be no excuse for advance in coal prices. If the price is boosted in any locality the fact should be reported to Washington at once for action by the Attorney General. The public should not be penalized by any enhanced price for coal when there is no justification for any increase.

Attorney General Daugherty favored a conference of the operators and miners and expressed regret that some of the operators had refused to meet in joint conference as provided in their contract.

The entire country is interested in this great industry and in its satisfactory and regular operation in order that the men who work in the mines may have employment and support their families, that the capital invested may receive a proper return, and that all our people and industries may have coal that is needed for the carrying on of our activities.

I think it is the sincere hope of all good Americans that somehow there may be a satisfactory and speedy adjustment of this controversy which affects the whole country and particularly affects a great body of men who are entitled to particular consideration because they are engaged in one of the most hazardous occupations in all our industrial life. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, ambassadors and ministers, $583,500.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 5, line 13, after the figures, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For the acquisition of land and buildings in Paris, France, to be used as the American Embassy under the provisions of the act of February 17, 1911, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in addition to the sum of $150,000 appropriated by an act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, approved March 2, 1921."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. It is new legislation and unauthorized by law.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully direct the attention of the Chair to what is known as the Lowden Act, approved February 7, 1911, which will be found in the Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 911. The Lowden Act is not long. I should like to read it as if it were in three sections. The substantial part of the statute reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire in foreign countries such sites and buildings as may be appropriated for by Congress for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States, and to alter, repair, and furnish the said buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman suspend a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The permanent occupant of the chair [Mr. DOWELL] was temporarily absent, and has now returned. He has looked up this matter, and the present occupant of the chair would ask the gentleman to recommence.

Mr. DOWELL resumed the chair.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I was in the act of reading the very short Lowden Act, upon which I maintain that my amendment is in order. I read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire in foreign countries such sites and buildings as may be appropriated for by Congress for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States, and to alter, repair, and furnish the said buildings; suitable buildings for this purpose to be either purchased or erected, as to the Secretary of State may seem best, and all buildings so acquired for the Diplomatic Service shall be used both as the residences of diplomatic officials and for the offices of the diplomatic establishment.

If the law stopped there, I take it that there could be no doubt that the amendment now pending would be in order, because there is no limitation of any kind upon the amount which may be appropriated, and because the amendment in other respects conforms accurately to the requirements of that portion of the statute. Then comes the proviso:

Provided, however, That not more than the sum of $500,000 shall be expended in any fiscal year under the authorization herein made.

So far as that proviso is concerned, I think it will not be contended that the amendment is objectionable. The sum of $150,000 is proposed, and there is no intimation—and I think there can be no intimation—that the remaining $350,000 permissible under the Lowden Act will be involved in the fiscal year in question.

Then we come to the proviso upon which I should like to speak somewhat more fully:

And provided further, That in submitting estimates of appropriation to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to the House of Representatives, the Secretary of State shall set forth a limit of cost for the acquisition of sites and buildings and for the construction, alteration, repair, and furnishing of buildings at each place in which the expenditure is proposed (which limit of cost shall not exceed the sum of $150,000 at any one place), and which limit shall not thereafter be exceeded in any case, except by new and express authorization of Congress.

The question, I think, has not been squarely decided as to whether that second proviso, which I have just read, excludes an item in an appropriation bill or an amendment to an appropriation involving either an original sum of more than $150,000 or an amendment the effect of which is to involve an expenditure in all, when taken in connection with previous action of Congress, of a total greater than $150,000. I think the question is not entirely free from doubt. In order that the Chair might become somewhat familiar with the question I ventured to bring it to the attention of the Chair a few days ago, when this bill was first presented to the House. I desire now to read again exactly what this proviso says:

The Secretary of State shall set forth a limit of cost, * * * which limit of cost shall not exceed the sum of $150,000.

My contention is that the second proviso is a limitation upon the power of the Secretary of State; that it is in no way a limitation on the power of Congress; and that it in no sense requires additional legislation in the event that the House has a proposal before it to expend more than $150,000 in some one place.

This second proviso tells the Secretary of State what he must do in proposing an estimate for the purchase of an embassy or legation. It is a limitation upon his power. It has nothing whatever to do with the power of the House. It has nothing whatever to do with the rules under which the House has bound itself when an appropriation bill is up for consideration. The last clause of this proviso states:

Which limit shall not thereafter be exceeded in any case, except by new and express authorization of Congress.

Of course, the "limit" mentioned in the last clause refers back to the limit of cost previously imposed on the Secretary of State. It has nothing to do with the rules of the House. It does not limit the power of the House in the event that a point of order is made against an item on an appropriation bill.

The question was presented last year in a somewhat similar fashion when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] proposed to this same appropriation bill an amendment for $150,000 for the purpose of acquiring an embassy at Paris. A point of order was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that that constituted new legislation and hence was out of order. The point of order that was then urged was that an estimate had not been furnished by the Secretary of State or by any other Government official, and that therefore the requirements of the Lowden Act had not been complied with. The gentleman from Ohio and others argued the point very fully. The Chair, who if I am not mistaken, was the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], stated that he was conscious of the importance of the point of order, that he had considered it with great care, and after discussion he was constrained to overrule the point of order.

I think that decision was sound, and I think it is the basis of what I hope and believe will be the decision of the Chair to-day. The second proviso, as the Chairman last year indicated, is a limitation upon the Secretary of State, but it has nothing to do with the powers of the House of Representatives; it has nothing to do with our freedom to act. There is no requirement in the law that we shall act only after an estimate shall have been furnished Congress by the Secretary of State for the specific purpose.

My whole contention, then, to sum up in a few words, is that the authority of Congress, the authority which is necessary before consideration of this item may be had against the point of order, is contained in the substantive portion of the Lowden Act and in the first proviso thereunder, both of which I have read; that the limitation contained in the second proviso is a limitation exclusively upon the Secretary of State and has nothing whatever to do with the powers of the House of Representatives when an amendment of the character now before the House is pending.

In this connection I would like to put in the RECORD a reference to the discussion last year, which occurs in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 9, 1921.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman's contention is that the only limitation on the power of Congress is that it shall not exceed $500,000 in any one year but they may spend any portion of it on any one project?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the point of order will not prevail. Ever since I have been a Member of Congress I have advocated the purchase of embassies and consulates abroad. It seems to me that we ought not to make it impossible for a man of moderate means to occupy one of these important positions. It matters not how brainy a man may be or how well versed he is in diplomacy, he can not occupy one of these positions abroad unless he is wealthy financially and able to live there in a manner which the office requires. We have made some progress in the last few years in the purchase of embassies and consulates. I hope the day is not far distant when all countries will see an embassy of ours in their capital. The gift of Mr. Morgan has enabled us to have a very fine embassy in the city of London. Before long we will have one of the best embassies in Berlin. Some years ago we purchased a consulate at Shanghai, China, which has proved a wonderful investment and of great importance to our Government.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to say to the gentleman that we are discussing the point of order and not the merits of the proposition.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman objects, I will ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

Mr. HUSTED. I suggest to the gentleman that he wait until the point of order is decided and then he will have ample opportunity to discuss the merits.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman prefers that, I will wait.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], it is that if the Secretary of State makes an estimate, as the law provides he shall, for this embassy of the United States, then Congress can appropriate the sum of $150,000 for it; but if the Secretary of State does not make an estimate, then Congress can appropriate, over a point of order, any sum that it pleases. The mere statement of the case shows how absurd it is. To say that we can not appropriate more than $150,000 if an estimate is made in the regular manner, but if the estimate is not made, then you can appropriate what you please, shows that either Congress did not know how to write a law at all, or else people have a very queer conception as to what the law is after it is written.

There is a provision in the act that the limit of $150,000 at a particular place shall in no case be exceeded unless there is a subsequent authorization by Congress.

That is not confined to an estimate made by the Secretary of State; that is a broad, straight declaration that the limit of cost of $150,000 can not be exceeded.

Now I call the attention of the Chair, although the Chair is undoubtedly as familiar with it as I am, that it has been the practice in the House of Representatives and Congress, especially in the House, for innumerable years, in making provisions for public works, such as public buildings, lighthouses, ships, and all sorts of public works, to provide in one law an authorization at a limit of cost, usually with the words "which shall not be exceeded," and in a subsequent law the appropriation itself. This Lowden Act should be construed in the light of the continuous practice of Congress for many years in fixing the limit of cost. Here was a case where Congress intended to, and I think clearly did, provide for the limit of cost at a particular place for an embassy of $150,000, with the provision that it should not in any case be exceeded, unless by subsequent authorization of Congress.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say one word in reply. My contention is not, as the gentleman from Illinois suggests——

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon if I misunderstood him.

Mr. ROGERS. I quite understand that it was unintentional.

My contention is not, as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, that our power in the House is different according to whether or not the Secretary of State sees fit to present an estimate. My contention is that the power of Congress is not affected one way or the other by the last proviso; that the authority of law which prevents the successful raising of points of order of this kind is contained in the substantive portion of the resolution and in the first proviso; that the second proviso is addressed wholly to the Secretary of State; and that Congress has the right to appropriate in this way on an appropriation bill whether or not the Secretary of State has submitted an estimate, provided, however, that the total amount involved does not exceed $500,000 in any one fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman contend, under the Lowden Act, that if the Secretary of State makes an estimate for an embassy building at a limit of cost not to exceed $150,000, that then it is in order in the House to appropriate $300,000 for it?

Mr. ROGERS. That is exactly my contention.

Mr. MANN. In face of the provision which limits the cost, that it shall not exceed the sum of $150,000 in any one place, "which limit shall not thereafter be exceeded in any case except by express authorization of Congress." There is an express provision that that limit of cost shall not be exceeded except by the express authority of Congress. That is not a direction to the Secretary of State. That is a limitation in law of the amount that can be appropriated.

Mr. ROGERS. The language of the law is—

The Secretary of State shall set forth a limit of cost.

Now, did Congress, when it used that language, intend to bind itself by the decision of the Secretary of State as to what the maximum amount should be in a given case?

Mr. MANN. Congress not only intended to bind itself, but it expressly provided—which limit of cost shall not exceed the sum of $150,000 at any one place, and which limit shall not thereafter be exceeded in any case except by new and express authorization of Congress.

That authorization of Congress is not to the Secretary of State in making an estimate. The limit of cost submitted by the Secretary of State can not be exceeded except by new authorization of Congress.

Mr. ROGERS. Congress was imposing upon the Secretary of State certain restrictions as to the breadth of his power. Congress did not intend, as I read the language of the Lowden Act, in any way to circumscribe its own powers provided the requirements of the first two-thirds of the act had been complied with.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sympathetic with the proposition to acquire an embassy in Paris, but I think the construction of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] of this Lowden Act is absolutely correct. In the first place, it authorizes the Secretary of State to acquire in foreign countries certain sites and buildings such as may be appropriated for by Congress for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments and to alter, repair, and furnish said buildings; and then it provides—

That not more than the sum of $500,000 shall be expended in any fiscal year under the authorization herein made.

That is a limitation upon the Executive and not upon the Congress. It means that no matter how many buildings we may acquire for embassy purposes or for consulates, under this authorization the Executive shall not expend more than $500,000 in any one year; and, of course, it is perfectly possible to assume that under this authorization buildings might be acquired which would amount to a total sum of more than $500,000; and I assume that is why that limitation was imposed. And then it is provided further that the Secretary of State shall set a limit of cost which shall not exceed $150,000 for any one of these buildings, and it further provides that that limitation of cost shall not be exceeded except by further authorization of Congress. And "further authorization of Congress" certainly does not mean by an appropriation bill, and "further authorization of Congress" certainly does not mean the authorization carried in the Lowden Act. It means some other basic statute authorizing the exceeding of the limit of $150,000 for any one building.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The authorization of the Lowden Act is as follows:

Provided, however, That not more than the sum of $500,000 shall be expended in any fiscal year under the authorization herein made: And provided further, That in submitting estimates of appropriation to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to the House of Representatives the Secretary of State shall set forth a limit of cost for the acquisition of sites and buildings and for the construction, alteration, repair, and furnishing of buildings at each place in which the expenditure is proposed (which limit of cost shall not exceed the sum of $150,000 at any one place) and which limit shall not thereafter be exceeded in any case, except by new and express authorization of Congress.

The Chair has no trouble in construing this proviso. It seems clear to the Chair from the language itself that the cost at any one place is limited to $150,000, unless Congress sees fit to authorize further expenditure. But in order that we may have the view of the House on this question the Chair desires to call attention to the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Lowden] when this legislation was presented to the House for consideration.

The interpretation by Mr. Lowden on this proviso and limitation of expenditure is in the following language—I read:

While it is true that under this bill with its present limitation it will not be possible to purchase embassies in some of the capitals of Europe where land has become very expensive, it will be possible within the limitation of $150,000 as proposed to purchase embassies and consulates while there is yet time.

This interpretation the Chair assumes was placed upon this legislation by the Congress at the time of its passage.

However, the Chair can interpret the language of the act itself in no other way than a limitation of the appropriation to $150,000 at any one place until Congress authorizes further expenditures.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECRETARIES IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

For salaries of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service, as provided in the act of February 5, 1915, entitled "An act for the improvement of the foreign service," as amended by the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, approved July 1, 1916, and the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, approved June 4, 1920, $379,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to how much was appropriated for this service for secretaries in the Diplomatic Service for the present fiscal year and the year preceding?

Mr. HUSTED. In 1921, $418,375; in 1920, $289,458.33; in 1919, $301,105; and in 1916, $157,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. What has been the occasion for the inordinate increase in the salaries paid to secretaries in the Diplomatic Service?

Mr. HUSTED. I do not think there has been an inordinate increase. There has been a considerable increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is rather inordinate when in five years the appropriation has more than doubled.

Mr. HUSTED. It is not because of the increase in the salary alone. It is because of the increase in the personnel as well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman believe that it is largely increase in salaries by reason of changes of law which have been enacted in the last two years?

Mr. HUSTED. There is a largely increased personnel, due to the extra business that has come to the missions on account of the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any data as to how much is due to increased personnel and how much to increased salaries?

Mr. HUSTED. I do not think any separation was made.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have an impression that some years ago we passed in connection with the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill a provision increasing the salaries of these secretaries considerably.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I think I can give the gentleman some information on that. Up to 1915, when there was a general salary readjustment for secretaries in the Diplomatic Service, the maximum salary paid to a secretary was $2,500. In the act of February 5, 1915, that salary was increased to a maximum of $3,000, and by the act of June 4, 1920, to a maximum of $4,000. The original range was from about $1,200 up to $2,500, and the present range is, I think, from $2,000 to a maximum of $4,000.

Mr. HUSTED. It is a range from $2,500 to $4,000. We have 23 secretaries in class 1, with salaries of $4,000 each; 27 in class 2, with salaries of $3,625 each; 29 in class 3, with salaries of $3,000 each; and 41 in class 4, with salaries of $2,500 each. That is the lowest salary paid to a secretary in the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether these secretaries are furnished any allowance in the way of quarters or heat?

Mr. HUSTED. No; they are furnished no allowance, except the post allowance in some countries where the cost of living has greatly advanced.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. On account of the value of United States exchange at this time, what are the countries where the cost of living is so great?

Mr. HUSTED. Japan is one of the shining instances. The State Department informed the subcommittee that in Japan, notwithstanding the fact that the rate of exchange as between the yen and the American dollar stood at about the same ratio as it did before the war, the cost of living in Japan had advanced 100 per cent over what it was before the war.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is China one of those countries?

Mr. HUSTED. No; I think not. Persia is one of the countries. There are a number of them.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I would say to the gentleman that I used to be a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs when that committee had appropriating power. I think there is a great evil in this system of post allowances. It simply amounts to a lump sum appropriation which the Secretary of State or his subordinates deal out to diplomatic officers, and I hope the Committee on Appropriations can work out some system whereby that practice may be discontinued. It is not a healthful situation at all.

Mr. HUSTED. We have started the work by making a very substantial reduction in the amount available for post allowances.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERPRETERS TO EMBASSIES AND LEGATIONS.

Interpreter to legation and consulate general to Persia, $2,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I note that on page 9 of the bill, where allowance for clerk hire is made, there is a provision which reads as follows:

Clerks, whenever hereafter appointed, shall, so far as practicable, be appointed under civil service rules and regulations.

That expression brings to my mind much that has been transpiring in the last few days. I predicted on the floor of this House some time ago when such an unfair deal was given Baltimore in the selection of its postmaster, when the civil service regulations were ignored and partisanship established in its stead. I know what it led to and that just the state of affairs would happen which has occurred. I was very much surprised, indeed, the other day when I heard that the President had issued an Executive order by which he dropped from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing 31 of its most efficient employees, employees who had spent from 39 years down in the service of that bureau; one who had started at $1.25 a day, one who had started at $60 a month, all in minor positions, and who through efficiency and good work had reached the high places which they held.

I notice that the newspaper stated that many of these men were not Democrats, that many of them were Republicans, that it was not a political move at all, and that not more than six, perhaps, of them voted. In that event it was all the more offensive. If it was not a political move, and if they were neither Democrats or Republicans, why were they dismissed from the service without a hearing as prescribed in section 6, part 1, volume 37 of the United States Revised Statutes?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to rise to a point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment. It seems to me that when we are discussing an appropriation bill we ought not to fill the RECORD with a lot of extraneous matter. There is a proper time when the gentleman can get permission to say what he is saying now without interjecting it into the middle of the debate on a bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does the gentleman object because he is not talking about the civil service?

Mr. TILSON. I am objecting simply because the gentleman is not talking about the bill itself.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is the gentleman insisting it is not in order to strike out the words "civil service" because they have already been stricken out?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, the gentleman is captious in his remarks. I am simply insisting that the gentleman from Maryland discuss in an orderly manner the bill before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the question before the House is civil service. I am discussing the question of civil service. No question was made when a gentleman arose on the floor of this House and delivered a long speech on the coal question, and no question was raised when gentlemen have spoken on the floor of this House upon various subjects.

And why it should be such a sore spot in the minds of some gentlemen on this side [Republican side] when I speak of civil service and the actions of the Executive order, I do not understand, unless they feel very sad about the occurrence. I think I have a perfect right to discuss the violation of the civil service act by the Executive order of the President when the very bill before us says that certain appointments must be made from the civil-service list. Now, I was saying that no investigation had been made——

Mr. TILSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order. We are not discussing the civil service. The paragraph containing a reference to the civil service has been passed, a subsequent paragraph has been read, and the gentleman realizes that he has no foundation whatever for claiming that he is discussing the bill. I therefore insist on the point of order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I insist I am within my rights to discuss the whole question of the civil service when the bill speaks of making selections from the civil service list.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to discuss the bill?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I mean to discuss civil service.

Mr. TILSON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-five Members are present; not a quorum.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. HUSTED and Mr. LINTHICUM took their places as tellers.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 6, noes 73.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum is present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOWELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 11065) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and that 281 Members had answered to their names, a quorum, and that he presented therewith a list of the absentees for insertion in the Journal and RECORD.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPENSES OF CONSULAR INSPECTORS.

For the actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses of consular inspectors while traveling and inspecting under instructions from the Secretary of State, $25,000: Provided, That inspectors shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence, itemized, not exceeding an average of $8 per day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee as to the interpretation of the language of the proviso which allows not exceeding an average of $8 per day for actual and necessary expenses for subsistence of these consular inspectors. How is the authorization not to exceed an average of $8 a day construed in its application by the department?

Mr. HUSTED. It is construed at an average by the month, as I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then would an inspector receive the maximum of $248 a month if there were 31 days in the month?

Mr. HUSTED. Provided they were actual expenses.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is, an inspector who may be only occupied in inspecting for maybe half a month, and yet his expenses might run much more than $8 on any one day, and under this phraseology he would be entitled to perhaps $15 a day.

A MEMBER. Not unless they were actual expenses.

Mr. STAFFORD. My colleague says not unless they were actual expenses. But the inspector in continental United States engaged in some inspectional work is limited to $4 a day.

Mr. HUSTED. As I understand it, if one of these inspectors went on a tour of inspection and was occupied 10 days in making that inspection, he would have to render an account and show that he actually expended $80 in order to receive the full amount. That is entirely irrespective of the amount expended on any one day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; he would want the privilege of expending almost any amount for his expenses on any one day, providing the average expenses for the month or a year did not exceed the maximum of $8 a day for the entire number of days in the year.

Mr. ROGERS. Of course, the gentleman is aware that a very large part of the work of these inspectors is traveling, by ocean and by railroad, many hundreds and thousands of miles. A journey across the Pacific or across the Atlantic may cost three or four hundred dollars on a modern-price steamer. If a consular inspector was only going to be paid a maximum of $8 a day, he would be seriously crippled in whatever he would undertake.

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact that this limit of $8 is simply for actual and necessary expenses of subsistence. When he travels he will be allowed the full amount of travel and, in addition, $8 a day on an average for all the days when away from home.

Mr. HUSTED. They are not allowed to draw anything on this account except while they are on tours of inspection, and then they may draw an average of $8 a day for the time they are actually occupied in the public business, provided they actually and necessarily spend it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Years back in the Postal Service we had an abuse whereby inspectors would run out from their headquarters for an hour or so so as to obtain the necessary $4 per diem in addition to the salary. The Post Office Committee attempted to correct that abuse by requiring that they had to be officially away from their designated headquarters in order to obtain this allowance. Is there any such regulation in the department that would restrict these inspectors and prevent them from receiving the allowance given for actual and necessary expenses except when away from their designated headquarters?

Mr. HUSTED. Let me say this to the gentleman: There are only seven consular inspectors, all told. There should be a great many more for the good of the service. These men are the only officials that we have who regularly inspect our consulates to see that they are managed on a business basis and economically, and the work which they perform is very important, indeed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not criticizing the number or the amount appropriated. I am inquiring about the administration of this $8 per diem. With the rate of exchange so favorable to these inspectors, this allowance of $8 per day might run to twice as much as what inspectors in the United States are receiving.

Mr. HUSTED. Well, they are traveling in foreign countries and often under very expensive conditions. I do not think this allowance is too high. I doubt if it always covers the actual expenses.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take the commercial attachés under the Department of Commerce. We do not allow them any such expenditures, and yet they are traveling the same way, and their expenses are just as great.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is talking about what the practice is. The language in the bill is for "traveling and inspecting under instructions from the Secretary of State." They could not do as the post-office inspectors used to do, because they can do this only when ordered to inspect, and only get it while traveling and inspecting, and then they could get only the actual amount of expenses.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes. I am directing my inquiry as to the character of the expenditure. For instance, the commercial attachés——

Mr. MANN. The commercial attachés do not travel as these men do.

Mr. STAFFORD. In Argentina the Department of Commerce has been asking for years more than the law allows them, $5 per day, perhaps. Here you are allowing them $8 a day on an average, which may run up to $10 or $12 a day of actual expenditure.

Mr. HUSTED. Let me tell the gentleman what this item covers. It covers the expense of transportation, steamship and railroad fares, hotel bills, and——

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I am not directing my inquiry as to the main part of the provision, but as to the interpretation of the phraseology in the proviso, "not exceeding $8 a day."

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that it is legislation. There is no law authorizing such an allowance as $8 a day.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas is made too late, debate having proceeded.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I reserved the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. On the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] the Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUSTED. I am frank to concede, Mr. Chairman, that the allowance of $5 a day is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. To what part of the provision does the gentleman from Texas make his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. To that part allowing $8 a day.

Mr. HUSTED. Does the gentleman make his point of order against the $8 or against the proviso?

Mr. BLANTON. To the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after the figures "$25,000," the words "Provided, That inspectors shall not be allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence, itemized, exceeding an average of $8 per day."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 9, line 14, after the figures "$25,000," insert: "Provided, That inspectors shall not be allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence, itemized, exceeding an average of $8 per day."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is legislation not authorized by law. Five dollars is the limit.

Mr. MANN. This is not legislation at all. This is a mere limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, to which a point of order is made by the gentleman from Texas that it is legislation. The Chair thinks the amendment is clearly a limitation and overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRANSPORTING REMAINS OF DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR OFFICERS, CONSULAR ASSISTANTS, AND CLERKS TO THEIR HOMES FOR INTERMENT.

For defraying the expenses of transporting the remains of diplomatic and consular officers of the United States, including consular assistants and clerks, who have died or may die abroad or in transit, while in the discharge of their official duties, to their former homes in this country for interment, and for the ordinary and necessary expenses of such interment, at their post or at home, $5,000.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUSTED: On page 13, after line 10, insert the following caption: "Embassies, legations, and consular buildings and grounds."

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a caption which was inadvertently omitted, which has always been carried in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST ALLOWANCES TO DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR OFFICERS.

To enable the President, in his discretion, and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to diplomatic and consular officers and consular assistants and officers of the United States Court for China in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $200,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph, beginning on line 13 and ending on line 20, for the reason that it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, while it is very unfortunate that a point of order should be made against this paragraph, which is absolutely necessary in order that the service may be properly maintained, I must admit that it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President to perform the obligations of the United States under the treaties of 1884, 1889, 1905, and 1906, between the United States and Mexico, including not to exceed $600 for rent, $15,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended for the salary of a commissioner,

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 24, page 14, the figures "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSPETH: Page 14, line 24, strike out the figures "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$25,000."

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the attention of the committee. I can not see any reason why as important a commission as this should be kicked around like a football in this Congress. This is a commission in which every American citizen is interested. If you will read the hearings, containing the statement of Undersecretary of State Fletcher, you will find that he testifies that last year, although there was an appropriation of only $5,000 made for this boundary commission, they took the unexpended balance from the appropriation of 1920 of $50,000 and expended the $25,000, as I recall. I think that was the amount, or probably something over $20,000.

Gentlemen, this is the commission that makes a survey of disputed territory between this country and Mexico. It is stated here that no part of this appropriation will be expended for a commissioner; but during all the time that we have not been recognizing Mexico, Mexico has had a boundary commissioner, as Mr. Fletcher says.

The Rio Grande, which is the boundary line between a large part of this country and Mexico, is susceptible to sudden changes, and when it does change it cuts off land that is in the United States to-day and puts it into Mexico to-morrow. I want to impress upon you gentlemen the importance of this commission and the reason why the engineers should be there upon the ground and make the surveys, so that when Mexico is recognized we may have the facts as to disputed territory. Mr. Carr, who was representing the State Department, as I believe, in the hearing, asked that at least $25,000 be appropriated. No part of that goes to a commissioner. I did not blame gentlemen here a couple of years ago for cutting off the appropriation, when there was a commissioner appointed under the other administration, who stayed in his office somewhere in one of the Southern States, practiced law, as I am informed, and did not attend to his business down on the national border, but you gentlemen over here now are in authority and unquestionably you will appoint a commissioner who will stay on the ground and perform his duty; at least you should do so. But the amount I am asking here is not for the pay of a commissioner, although I think at the present time this country is likely to suffer by reason of the fact that it has no commissioner. During all this time Mexico has its commissioner, so Fletcher states, and, as I understand, he is performing the functions of his office; but this appropriation is for the purpose of water gauging and for additional water gaugers along the Rio Grande and for the pay of engineers to make the surveys, and last year they expended that amount; but there is now no unappropriated balance remaining out of which they can make this expenditure.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Do I understand correctly that the purpose of this appropriation is to make surveys of this land that shifts its nationality overnight, one day being in Texas and the next day in Mexico?

Mr. HUDSPETH. To-morrow it may be in Mexico, by a change of the river by erosion or avulsion.

Mr. TILSON. Is it the purpose of this appropriation to have these surveys made and all this information and data collected and ready as soon as we recognize Mexico, so that we can settle these questions as to boundaries?

Mr. HUDSPETH. That is the idea, so that we will have the data concerning where the boundary line should be. Under the treaty the boundary line along the Rio Grande is the middle of the stream. I will state to my friend from Connecticut that when the stream changes there ought to be a commissioner on the ground to make the survey, so that we will have the information that Mexico will have, so that in the arbitration she will not have any advantage.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. What is the salary of this engineer?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I think it is $5,000.

Mr. BEGG. Will not $15,000 provide for him?

Mr. HUDSPETH. No; not according to Mr. Fletcher. I am asking this addition not for a commission but upon the estimates of Carr and Fletcher. You understand there have to be men along the river to make these surveys and other necessary work in which this country is vitally interested.

Mr. BEGG. How many men has he under him?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Fletcher's statement was that the men required besides the engineer would call for an appropriation of $25,000. The engineer is not the only man who is needed there.

Mr. BEGG. If the gentleman will look at the hearings, as to what has actually been performed by this commission, he will find that $15,000 is a pretty generous appropriation at this time.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that last year they expended over $20,000, and there was no commissioner's salary included in that expenditure. Why do you want to deprive them of the men that they actually need along the river?

Mr. BEGG. They spent about that same amount two years ago.

Mr. HUDSPETH. They had $50,000 two years ago.

Mr. BEGG. They did not spend it all.

Mr. HUDSPETH. They spent every dollar of it, and this country is as much your country as it is mine, and you ought not to cut them down here, because the testimony is in the hearings that they need it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BEGG. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEGG. Now, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact the year before, when I said they had $25,000, they actually spent $20,407, and the gentleman is entirely in error when he says that they spent $50,000.

Mr. HUDSPETH. They had an appropriation in 1919–20 of $50,000, and they had in prior years $50,000. There was a reason for cutting it down then, because they had a commissioner who did not do any work, and they cut him off in the appropriation. You gentlemen are in the majority, and if you want land taken from this country by Mexico it is your fault and not mine; you are responsible to our country.

Mr. BEGG. We accept the responsibility.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; you accept lots of things. I have never known anything that your party would not accept. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, we realize the importance of making the surveys and measuring the water and preserving all the data necessary to the protection of American interests, but I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the estimates made by the department for the next fiscal year.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. I will after I get through with this brief statement. In the estimate of $25,000 they provide for a commissioner at $5,000; for a consulting engineer at $4,500; for a secretary at $4,000; for rent, $1,400; for equipment, printing, clerks, and so forth, $5,100; and for water measurements, $5,000. Now, these items made up $25,000, and the only items contained in that estimate in which the gentleman is really interested is the item of $5,000 for water measurements and the item for surveying. That is what he wants done; he wants the water measured and the necessary surveys made——

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to ask if Mr. Carr and Mr. Fletcher, of the State Department, did not state it was absolutely necessary for the protection of the American rights that you appropriate $25,000?

Mr. HUSTED. No; on page 155 of the hearings this is what Mr. Carr states:

My understanding is that this Government has not felt that anything could be accomplished by the appointment of a commissioner until we recognize the Mexican Government, when the commission could make binding decisions in reference to the boundary and matters affecting the boundary. That, however, does not apply to the measuring of the water, which should be kept up just as if the two Governments were in diplomatic relations.

That is exactly what we are providing for—the measuring of the water, making the survey, collecting all the data, and doing absolutely everything that is necessary for the protection of American interests. We did not think it was advisable to appoint a commissioner and pay him a salary of $5,000 when he has absolutely nothing to do. We did not think it necessary to provide money for some of the other items that allow the appointment of clerks, and so forth, when they have nothing to do.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If they expended over $20,000 last year, would not it stand to reason that they should have that amount this year?

Mr. HUSTED. I am calling the gentleman's attention to the estimates. There is a detailed estimate, and that is exactly what they propose to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOUNDARY LINE, ALASKA AND CANADA, AND THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

To enable the Secretary of State to mark the boundary and make the surveys incidental thereto between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada, in conformity with the award of the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal and existing treaties, including employment at the seat of government of such surveyors, computers, draftsmen, and clerks as are necessary; and for the more effective demarcation and mapping, pursuant to the treaty of April 11, 1908, between the United States and Great Britain, of the land and water boundary line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, as established under existing treaties, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, including the salaries of the commissioner and the necessary engineers, surveyors, draftsmen, computers, and clerks in the field and at the seat of government, expense of printing and necessary traveling, for payment for timber necessarily cut in determining the boundary line not to exceed $500, and commutation to members of the field force while on field duty or actual expenses not exceeding $5 per day each, to be expended in accordance with regulations from time to time prescribed by the Secretary of State, $30,000: Provided, That when the commissioner is absent from Washington and from his regular place of residence on official business he shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses of subsistence not in excess of $8 per day.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to that paragraph in the bill embraced within the last proviso, line 23, page 15, and line 2, page 16, which is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill in that it provides subsistence at $8 a day.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I will reserve it.

Mr. MANN. I can tell the gentleman why the proviso was put into the act. Some years ago it was found that the International Boundary Commission under the law and under the appropriation as it is in the bill, without a proviso, were charging expenses for subsistence practically 365 days in the year. Congress did not think it ought to be done. None of these gentlemen lived in Washington, none of them had an official residence in Washington; they were not engaged all the time on the work, but they were charging subsistence for all the time. So Congress put in a limitation that the only time they could charge subsistence was when they were absent from Washington or their regular place of residence on official business.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I imagine that if the gentleman from Illinois was commissioner and had a force of men under him and had to put up in a hotel somewhere in order to get something to eat, he would not put up at an $8 a day hotel and put his men up at a lower class hotel at $5 a day, which this bill authorizes. In other words, in lines 20 and 21 it provides that his field force shall be allowed $5 a day, and then it gives the commissioner $8 a day.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Are these gentlemen discussing the point of order or the merits of the bill?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas has reserved the point of order for a moment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not want to be captious, but the chairman called me down on the same thing that the gentleman from Illinois is doing.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas reserved the point of order. I would like to say to my friend from Texas that when I go to New York or even to Washington and stop at a hotel it costs me a good deal more than it does my secretary or any other employee that I may have. When I was practicing law, it cost me a great deal more at a hotel than it did to send a clerk there or take him with me. However, that is not the question. I think if this limitation is stricken out, the result will be that these commissioners will have the right which they exercised formerly—I do not know whether they will exercise it or not hereafter—to charge subsistence for practically every day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In the gentleman's opinion is it material whether this language is in or out, since there is no longer a commissioner? The work now is done by the Geodetic Survey. There is no commissioner.

Mr. MANN. There is no commissioner?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is a commission but no commissioner.

Mr. HUSTED. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. I am not informed as to that. There was a commissioner at one time.

Mr. HUSTED. I think the gentleman is in error about that. There is a commissioner, but he draws no salary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. My understanding was that Mr. Jones of the Geodetic Survey has charge of it instead of the commissioner.

Mr. HUSTED. He is the American commissioner, but he draws no salary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have not seen the paper making the transfer, but my understanding is that the position of commissioner was entirely abolished, and that that was another duty added to the Geodetic Survey.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, at a great many of the hotels in the country you can get a room, not on the first floor, with a bath, but you can get a pretty good room for $2 a day. Oh, I do not mean in New York, but I mean down in Oklahoma and in my State.

Mr. MANN. But this commission does not go to Oklahoma or Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; but up in Canada things are not so very much higher than they are in the South, and you can get a pretty good meal for $1.

Mr. MANN. I am not particular as to the amount, but I speak of this because of the great abuse that did grow out of the matter. We had some very fine gentlemen as commissioners, all of them I think formerly in political life, who have been retired for one reason or another. We thought we would not give them in addition to the salary of $7,500 a year subsistence for every day in the year. That is the reason this provision was put into the law some years ago.

Mr. BLANTON. Whenever you once raise subsistence to $8 per day for one set of employees, you are going to have to do it for all of the rest.

Mr. MANN. I doubt that. I can not travel all over the country for a subsistence of $8 a day, and I doubt whether the gentleman from Texas can.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, after the numerals "$30,000," in line 23, by inserting the words "Provided, That when the commissioner is absent from Washington and from his regular place of residence on official business, he shall not be allowed actual and necessary expenses of subsistence in excess of $8 per day."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUSTED: Page 15, line 23, after the numerals "$30,000," insert: "Provided, That when the commissioner is absent from Washington and from his regular place of residence on official business, he shall not be allowed actual and necessary expenses of subsistence in excess of $8 per day."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is legislation. The law authorizes subsistence at not more than $5 a day. I am sure that the Chair wants uniformity of rulings with respect to these matters. If you permit this amendment, it clearly authorizes this commissioner to spend as much as $8 per day, which would be $3 in excess of the authorization of law, and certainly to that extent it is legislation. I do not think there can be any question about that whatever.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, this is on all fours with the amendment recently offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which was held in order by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the same question is involved.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word on the point of order. I am not particularly interested in the amendment, but it does seem to me that we ought to have at least an element of consistency in legislation. I am assuming that the Chair will rule as he did a few moments ago, that this is a limitation on an expenditure; but suppose there was a statute providing that a commissioner shall be paid a salary of $5,000 a year, and that the committee brought in a paragraph saying that the salary of the commissioner shall not exceed $7,000 per year. Clearly that would be subject to the point of order as a change in existing law. It does not remedy the matter, it does not make it a limitation, to simply change the verbiage of the statement and say that the salary of the commissioner shall not be more than so and so. In other words, stating a positive proposition in a negative way can not be held in order, if you are going to attempt at all to abide by the rules of the House. I do not care whether he is allowed $8 or $10 a day, but it seems to me if you are not going to be consistent, you are opening the gate wide so that anything can be made in order by stating it in a negative way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], who has just taken his seat, I invite the attention of the Chair to line 18 of the bill, which authorizes a part of the $30,000 to be used for "traveling expenses." The question now arises, What part of the $30,000 may be used for traveling expenses? The proviso, as it came from the committee and as it appears in the bill, is subject to the point of order; but when the proviso is changed and is put in the negative, it thereby becomes a limitation, by providing that such part of the $30,000 as may be expended for traveling may not exceed $8 per day. So, it seems to me that, notwithstanding the fact that there is no commissioner to use it, and that there will not be another who may use it, the point of order is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL PRISON COMMISSION.

For subscription of the United States as an adhering member of the International Prison Commission, and the expenses of a commission, including preparation of reports, $1,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice the appropriation for the International Prison Commission is reduced from $2,550, which was carried in the current law, to $1,500.

Mr. HUSTED. The reason for that, I will say to the gentleman, is because our quota is payable in francs, and $1,500 will buy the same number of francs to pay our quota that $2,550 formerly purchased.

Mr. MANN. That may have been the case when the estimate was made, but I somewhat doubt whether it is the case just now.

Mr. HUSTED. It was figured out to the satisfaction of the State Department, at any rate, that it would be an amount, when translated into francs, to cover our full quota.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding for the Pan American Union, $20,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the whole paragraph beginning on line 17, page 16, and going down to the end of the paragraph. It is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill. I would like to say this, if the Chair will permit me, that the resolution which created this Pan American Union, as the Chair well knows, limited its life to 10 years, and it provided that any one of these countries could withdraw upon giving certain notice within that time. That provision in no way extended the life of the union. The union, by reason of the terms of the resolution which created it, expired at the end of 10 years.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BURTON. I think the gentleman desires to be accurate. Is he quite sure that it is limited to 10 years? This is the resolution which was passed at the conference of countries of the Western Hemisphere at Buenos Aires in 1910:

The American Republics bind themselves to continue to support the Pan American Union for a term of 10 years from this date, and to pay annually into the treasury of the Pan American Union their respective quotas. Any of the Republics may cease to belong to the Union of American Republics upon notice to the governing board two years in advance. The Pan American Union shall continue for successive terms of 10 years—

That is a very frequent provision in treaties—

unless 12 months before the expiration of such term a majority of the members of the union shall express the wish, through the Secretary of State of the United States of America, to withdraw therefrom on the expiration of the term.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not the resolution that passed this Congress.

Mr. BURTON. This is the one that created the Pan American Union.

Mr. BLANTON. But its life is limited to 10 years.

Mr. BURTON. No. It says the Pan American Union shall continue for successive terms of 10 years, unless 12 months before the expiration of such term a majority of the members of the union shall express a wish to the Secretary of State of the United States of America to withdraw therefrom on the expiration of the term.

Mr. BLANTON. The Chair will note that under the reading of the gentleman from Ohio the provision of the resolution obligates each one of these countries to pay so much per year during 10 years unless some of them within that 10 years give two years' notice of the withdrawal. The mere provision that the union shall extend on does not carry with it any authorization of law for the continuance of these obligations. There is no obligation on any country to pay any of these amounts under this resolution except during this first 10-year period.

Mr. HUSTED. Does the gentleman make the point of order against the entire paragraph?

Mr. BLANTON. Against the entire paragraph, because it includes legislation.

Mr. HUSTED. Including the second proviso at the bottom of page 16, line 25? Is your point of order addressed to the entire section?

Mr. BLANTON. It is to the whole paragraph.

Mr. HUSTED. Including the second proviso?

Mr. BLANTON. It is as to all of it.

Mr. HUSTED. Then I admit the paragraph is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BURTON. Before the decision is made on that, there is one other opinion to which I wish to call attention in a positive treaty. Our relations with those countries are so important and our participation has been so generous and so responded to by these countries I do not like to see this go out on a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know that out of this $100,000 fund that Congress is providing the employees of this Government in this Pan American Union are spending part of it to insure their lives?

Mr. BURTON. I regard the question of such importance that a bit of gossip like that does not interest me.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not gossip. It is a fact, as testified before the committee.

Mr. BURTON. There is another agreement which is a substantive treaty. This treaty is signed by representatives of the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

It is a treaty made in regard to trade-marks in 1910, in August of that year, in which there is a provision that clearly recognizes this resolution. Two bureaus are provided to enforce the regulations in regard to trade-marks, one at Habana and the other at Rio de Janeiro. They are termed "international bureaus," and this is what was provided:

The international bureaus shall be governed by identical regulations formed with the concurrence of the Governments of the Republic of Cuba and the United States of Brazil and approved by all the other signatory States.

Then follows this clause:

Their budgets, after being sanctioned by said Governments, shall be defrayed by all the signatory States in the same proportion as that established by the International Bureau of American Republics at Washington, and in this particular they shall be placed under the control of those Governments in whose territory they are established.

Now, that is a plain recognition in that treaty of these resolutions that were passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUSTED: Page 16, after line 16, insert:

PAN AMERICAN UNION.

Pan American Union, $100,000: Provided, That any moneys received from the other American Republics for the support of the union shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the chairman of the governing board of the union for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the union and of carrying out the orders of the said governing board.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is legislation, not authorized on an appropriation bill; and I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this particular amendment offered by the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill provides that in addition to this $100,000, the various amounts which the countries themselves are obligated to pay into this union are to be covered as a credit, but may nevertheless be used by the board in charge of this Pan American Union in paying the expenses of the union. In other words, we are appropriating for use in expending every single dollar of the $100,000, which is designed to cover the whole cost of operation, and then taking all the money that should go into the Treasury besides and paying it in addition. It is clearly legislation not authorized by law.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I would call the attention of the Chair to a provision of law to be found in volume 26 of the Statutes at Large, page 275, which is as follows:

For the organization and establishment under the Secretary of State of the International Union of American Republics for the prompt collection and distribution of commercial information, $36,000, and the sums contributed by other American Republics for this purpose when collected shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. BLANTON. That is an appropriation.

Mr. HUSTED. Yes. That is in an appropriation bill. But it does not follow that it is not legislation of a permanent character simply because it is carried in an appropriation bill. There is a great deal of permanent legislation which is carried in appropriation bills.

I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the word "establishment" is used, and I doubt if there is a stronger word in the English language to indicate an intention to provide for a permanency. Take the dictionary definition of "establish." Webster says it means—to originate and secure the permanent existence of; to found, to institute, to create and regulate; said of a colony, a State, or other institution.

And from the Standard Dictionary I quote this definition:

To settle or fix, confirm, place on a permanent footing, found, ordain, or institute, as to establish a colony.

I call the attention of the Chair to our own Constitution:

We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Now, this bill provides not only for the organization but also for the establishment, under the direction of the Secretary of State, of the International Union of American Republics; and I contend, Mr. Chairman, that that provides sufficient authority to support any appropriation made by Congress until this union is disestablished by some process provided by law.

At the fourth international American conference assembled at Buenos Aires in 1910 the following resolution was adopted:

The American Republics bind themselves to continue to support the Pan American Union for a term of 10 years from this date, and to pay annually into the treasury of the Pan American Union their respective quotas. Any of the Republics may cease to belong to the Union of American Republics upon notice to the governing board two years in advance.

And then follows this language, which has not been quoted here before, and which is all-controlling upon the decision of the question as to whether or not the member States have decided to dissolve this union.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HUSTED. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The quota of the United States is $36,000, and yet the gentleman seeks to appropriate $100,000, and then let us spend all the balance contributed by the other countries.
